Democracy and Personal Liberty

At the recent Saratoga conference held by prominent New York politicians for the purpose of reorganizing the Democracy it was decided to return to first principles. Therefore a declaration was made in favor of "no interference with the personal liberty of any citizen except such as is essential to secure the equal rights of all citizens." This is certainly true democratic dogma. It is in harmony with the fundamentals of the democracy enunciated in this country in the days of Jefferson, but like many other democratic principles it is a fiction. Democracy must always end in something opposed to that to which theoretically it leads. The theory of doctrinaire democrats is that democracy increases the whole sum of liberty, but the result as we are privileged to see in this country is to diminish all liberty; for when the masses rule individual liberty is identified with caprice and becomes the toy of hypocrisy. In the days of Jefferson it was the maxim of democracy that to be governed stringently was to be governed badly, but of the soundness of that sentiment we have long since become insensible; we have drifted back to the tyranny of the Blue Laws. Here in California, or at any rate in San Francisco, we do not appreciate how little personal liberty there is left in the country. To apprehend the revolution that has been wrought it is necessary to go into States where it is a crime for a host to offer a guest a glass of wine, where theatrical performances and ball games are prohibited on Sunday, and where the gift of a cigarette is one of the unholiest of misdemeanors which no conscientious policeman will tolerate.

"A Soldier of the Public Good"

Of the late Governor Johnson it has been said by one of his panegyrists that he was "a soldier of the common good" and that "he worked for the people, not for himself." This it must be admitted is a pretty fine encomium. The man that works for the people and not for himself in this sordid age is one open to divine illumination and possessed of divine grace. In him survive those nobler instincts of human nature which, pessimists tell us, are grown so rare that the memory of them is kept alive only by tradition. Perhaps the pessimist is not far from the truth. This suggestion we make though sensible of the presence in this country of innumerable reformers who cumber themselves with fruitless pains to remedy remote evils. Notwithstanding that these zealous patriots, consumed ostensibly with love of country and an irritable anxiety for the good of others, profess to be sincere champions of the people and altogether unselfish they do not incite us to ear-splitting applause. This restraint on our part is due to several causes; we know how difficult it is to say how much of their fiery vehemence is public spirit and how much is a passionate concern for their own interests; we know also how difficult it is for the shrewdest of men to be sure that he is right when championing any particular reform; and knowing these things we are inclined to be impatient of men who are forever whangdoodling in advocacy of some new wrinkle in politics and attributing mean motives to everybody that dissents from their judgments. There is nothing more difficult than to know when the interests of mankind are being advanced; many of the so-called reforms frequently celebrated that mark epochs in the world's history are now regarded as among the most mischievous of happenings; but the passionate politician who is above all things the people's friend is never in doubt even about the most abstruse and profound questions of public policy. He always knows he is right, and what is worse he always knows that everybody who does not agree with him is a rogue. A tolerant placidity has been altogether denied him. Abstracted in one thought, vertiginous from the whirl of one idea, he is enraged at the incorrigibility of everybody that shares not his enthusiasm. Now who shall say that this passionate reformer is never devoted to the calculation of self-interest? Of course there are exceptions to this class of public spirited citizens. Governor Johnson, perhaps, was one. Doubtless he deserves the encomium which we have quoted. But with respect to the majority of professedly unselfish politicians, we regret to say the thread of calculation that runs through their performances is more easily discernible than the principle of disinterested action. The aim of most of these men apparently is to win the confidence of the people. This in itself is commendable if the motive be to serve the people, but in a world where the reputation of a wise man depends on the judgment of fools we are justified in being sceptical of the pretensions of those men who are forever striving for popular acclaim; for to be the darling of the multitude it is almost imperative that one should do things inconsistent with fidelity to a sound conscience. The honest politician should worship nothing but reason and justice, but the politician who does this and succeeds to the extent of becoming the Governor of a State achieves a miracle.

Taft Pleads For Less Acrimony

That President Taft has been giving some thought to matters touched upon in the foregoing paragraph we learn from the sentiments expressed by him in his address to the Mormons last Sunday. It was an address that breathed the spirit of charity and brotherly love, and that should be read and digested by some of the leading citizens of this feud-stricken city. The President gently reprehended the mean spirit of vindictiveness and the practice of attributing bad motives to those who differ from us. "I am urging," he said, "less acrimony in public discussion, more charity with respect to each other as to what moves each man to do what he does and not to charge dishonesty and corruption until you have a real reason for doing so." In view of the fact that the President is on his way to this city it becomes especially interesting to note his allusion to the practice of assuming that men against whom there is no evidence are guilty of crime. "It is one thing," he said, "to prosecute a criminal when you have evidence, and it is another thing to ascribe motives to the act of a man when you haven't any evidence."

An Astronomical Controversy

Nothing argues more cogently the want of imagination than the dogmatizing of our learned scientists of Mount Hamilton with reference to conditions on Mars. These gentlemen are so commonplace and so essentially without imagination that they cannot conceive of the habitation of an uninhabitable region of the universe. To them the pardoxical is impossible. They have scrutinized Mars from a mountain top, and they have found no evidence of the things that we regard as essential to life, and straightway they conclude that the face of the planet is as dead as a door nail. It is beyond their mental capacity to appreciate the fact that their negative testimony is of no value. They have absolute faith in logic, and anything which to them is illogical is untrue. How remarkable this is we come to realize when we reflect that these scientists spend a lot of time peering into the infinite, a region absolutely inhospitable to the mind of man, incongruous with his powers, evading the most cunning meshes woven by his intellect. Is it not indeed remarkable that egotism should survive in these men with their minds constantly uplifted into infinite space? Assuredly one would naturally suppose that they would be disinclined to be dogmatic about anything pertaining to the overwhelming complexity of the cosmos. True they have ascertained that in the abysses of space there is no chaos; as far as they have been able to penetrate they have found the same superhuman fixedness of law displayed in terrestrial matter; as far as they have been able to observe the heavens confirm their observations of the earth, but which one of them can answer the question of Lucretius, "Speed an arrow from the limits of the world—will it fall into nothing, into nihility?" Astronomers know the laws of reason, but do they know what it is in us that reasons? Have they yet determined whether space is matter or spirit? Notwithstanding the great progress that has been made by astronomical science since the days of the Chaldean shepherds, there is still vastly more in the solar system than is dreamt of in the profound philosophy of the star gazers of either Mount Lowe or Mount Hamilton. According to one set of scientists there is no life on Mars because that planet contains none of the elements which man in his little wisdom deems essential to human life. Voltaire once asked, "Is it not easy to imagine a two legged animal without feathers, having intelligence without our shape or the use of speech?" Anybody who is not hopelessly prosaic will admit that it is. And it is as easy to imagine a people on Mars existing without the conditions which are deemed essential to life on this planet; which is easy enough to anybody in whom the stars awaken reverence and who sees in the flowers of the field a reflection of the wisdom and omnipotence of a supreme intelligence.

Vulnerability of the Republic

Whatever may be the truth with reference to the possibility and probability of the military occupation of the Pacific Coast by the forces of Japan, it is certain that after reading General Homer Lea on the subject anyone who is not himself an authority will at least come to the conclusion that there is abundant reason for taking the question seriously. To what extent General Lea is qualified to discuss this perennial topic we do not know, but we have been impressed by his arguments, by his analysis of conditions existing in the Pacific and by the facts which he presents to demonstrate the vulnerability of the United States to armed invasion and to persuade us that Japan's paramount policy is the military conquest of the ocean in which she has achieved her greatest triumphs. He is discussing the subject in a series of articles which are now running in Harper's Weekly. In the first of these he addresses himself to the importance to Japan of dominating the Pacific and to the question of the relative strength of Japan and the United States. He maintains that the future of Japan depends basically upon the possession of a sufficient number of strategic positions in the Pacific to enable her to command all trade routes to and from the East and West. These positions are now in possession of this Republic. The most important of them is the Philippine group which commands all ship routes from Europe to the Far East. The possession of these islands is of more value to Japan than either Korea or Manchuria. Only three days' steaming from the main naval bases in Japan, her possession of the Philippines would complete her chain of island fortresses from the Peninsula of Kamchatka to the Indian Ocean. For other reasons of a strategic nature which General Lea recites it is essential to the carrying out of Japan's maritime policy that she should be in possession of the harbor of Pago-Pago in the island of Tutuila of the Samoan group and also the Hawaiian Islands, but of more intrinsic value to Japan than any other American possession is the territory of Alaska on account of its vast coal fields. As in ancient times the possession of timber-bearing provinces was essential to naval supremacy, so the command of bordering coal fields is imperative to the nation that would extend its dominion over the Pacific. It is not news to us that were Japan to become the owner of these American possessions she would become well nigh invulnerable in the Pacific, but General Lea does not deal altogether in commonplaces. The opinion is prevalent in this country that Japan is inferior to us in naval strength. According to General Lea this is a delusion. From statistical tables we learn that the navy of the United States ranks third in vessels and tonnage and that Japan's navy ranks fifth. These tables are misleading; for while our battleships outnumber those of Japan the new type of battleship that has been added to the Mikado's navy enables the Japanese war vessels to carry nearly forty per cent more big guns. Nor is it only in equipment that we are inferior to Japan. The principles upon which our navy is governed are such as to render it inferior to that of our Oriental rival. For example under our system captains are not commissioned until they reach the age of fifty-six, while in Japan the average age of such officers is thirty-eight, a difference of nearly twenty years. This is not all. While captains in the American navy have only four and a half years in this grade the Japanese have eight, giving them twice as much experience though they are twenty years younger. The point of all this is that age has much to do with the efficiency of men in command of big battleships. Their duties put a great strain on them; and their faculties endure only so long as their vigor is unimpaired. "As the success of armies depends primarily on the abilities of general officers," says General Lea, "so is the great naval engagements of the future where fleets instead of single vessels will engage in battle, success will depend upon the ability, vigor and experience of seagoing flag officers." In the American navy rear-admirals are not commissioned until they reach the advanced age of sixty, while in Japan officers are elevated to this rank at forty-four. In America seagoing flag-officers pass only one and a half years in this grade, while in Japan such officers are on duty for eleven years. Another important point that General Lea makes is that whereas in Japan the army and navy are placed above and beyond the reach of politics, changes in the Cabinet never affecting the Ministers of War or Navy, in this country not only is there no continuity in naval development but no freedom from political circumspection. Certainly the deduction is obvious that the Japanese system is superior to ours, for the proposition is unanswerable that the nation which possesses a flexible naval system will be able to adjust its naval policy to new conditions much quicker than the one whose naval department is the shuttlecock of contending political factions. The situation as described by General Lea would be bad enough were our disadvantages merely those to which we have called attention. He further observes that from the standpoint of strategic position we are at a great disadvantage because the entire Japanese naval power, not alone her fleets but her navy-yards, docks, arsenals, people and resources are in what he terms "the strategic centre" of the Pacific, while the naval bases and naval resources of the United States are in the Atlantic, seventeen thousand miles from the scene of the "approaching struggle." What naval bases we have in our Pacific possessions are but in an embryonic state. Surely it is to be hoped that there are some few factors in our favor to offset the advantages discussed by General Lea; that up our sleeve, so to speak, we have a little of the raw material of victory of which the wily Japanese are as profoundly ignorant as the learned General.

Halley's Comet

The Recurring Phenomenon Which Was Anciently Regarded as a Portent of Evil and Against Which Pope Calixtus III Was Supposed to Have Launched the Thunders of the Church, is Eagerly Awaited by Scientists Armed With Telescopes, Spectroscopes and Cameras

By Francis West

Centuries agone, on the plain of Shinar, the Chaldean sage, gazing on the heavens and working out the motions of the stars, was startled by the sudden flashing of a silver spear across the celestial dome. From century to century other star-gazers have looked with awed wonder on the same phenomenon. But there are no records of the appearance of that brilliant silver spear before the year of grace 451. Thence onward that recurring light in the heavens became a portent, a harbinger of evil, a celestial sign of terrestrial disturbances so dreaded that when the fiction grew that a Roman Pontiff had launched the thunders of excommunication against it, there were none to challenge the story.

Halley's comet—that is the scientific designation for this portent of the olden times. The charting of the heavens has robbed it of some of its terrors, so that when next it flashes into our ken, it will not be regarded as the forerunner of war or pestilence or rapine. But even the men of today, never so happy as when they are scornfully crying down the superstitions of the past, feel something like a vague unrest when they contemplate the onward sweep of this celestial pendulum.

EDMUND HALLEY

Halley's comet pays a visit to earth once every seventy-five years. It came last in 1835 and it is now streaming through the heavens in a path of light which will be visible to the naked eye in April or May of 1910. Meanwhile it has already advanced within sight of the telescope. More than a week ago it was seen far in the Orion region, out beyond the track of Jupiter, 300 millions of miles away.

Halley's comet takes its name from the son of a London soapboiler. Born in the odor of kitchen fat in 1656, Edmund Halley was educated at St. Paul's school and at Oxford. At the age of twenty he published a treatise on the planetary orbits and argued the sun's axial rotation. Thenceforward his was a well-filled career. In 1698 he was appointed to the command of a king's ship for a cruise of observation and discovery in the Pacific, but his crew mutinied and he had to turn back. Next year he tried again with results which have ever since been recognized as of the greatest scientific importance. Thereafter he occupied the Savilian chair of geometry at Oxford, succeeded Sir Hans Sloane as secretary of the Royal Society and in 1721 became Astronomer Royal.

Halley saw the comet which was to bear his name in 1682 and the result of his brilliant researches convinced him to a mathematical certainty that the seemingly erratic wanderer of the skies had traveled the same circuit as the comets of 1531 and 1607. From the establishment of that fact to the identification of the comet as a recurring visitor to the ken of earth was an easy step for a man of Halley's boldness of deduction; and the first prediction of the coming of a comet followed. "If it should return," he wrote, "according to our predictions, about the year 1758, impartial posterity will not refuse to acknowledge that this was first discovered by an Englishman." Halley died in 1742, seventeen years before the comet returned with a brilliancy surpassed only once before; but his words were remembered and the visitor has been known ever since as Halley's comet.

Verified records of the coming of Halley's comet are scattered through the pages of history and it must be admitted that coincident happenings fully justified the superstitious dread with which its appearance was regarded. The comet blazed in the sky in the year 451 when Attila, the Scourge of God, swept with his hordes out of Hungary and spread destruction in a bloody path that brought him to the gates of Rome. The comet came again in 1066 and when William the Conqueror led his Norman hosts across the English Channel to subdue Saxon England on the field of Hastings, a rude age connected the comet and the seeming calamity. In 1378 the comet was visible for six weeks, a sign to the times of the decay of faith and the scandal which rent the Papacy in twain with rival sees at Rome and Avignon.

The next appearance of the comet, in 1456, was the most famous of all. Hunyadi was making the last stand for Christendom against the Turks and although the unbelievers were beaten back at Belgrade, Athens fell and the Crescent replaced the Cross on the Acropolis. For nearly five hundred years it was believed that Pope Calixtus III had launched a solemn bull against this comet and had ordered the church bells to be rung to affright the theatening monster. Although this story was long denied by ecclesiastical authorities, it was ac-

Laric, the Stage Driver

By Leopold Aubert (From the French)

Laric, stagedriver of Saint-Maurice, is a good natured man, whose beard is just turning gray.

For twenty years he drove the stage from Orange to Saint-Maurice, and by his constant good humor, his punctuality and honesty, succeeded in acquiring the esteem of all the inhabitants of that region. "Laric?" the people used to say, "you can travel with him without fear, he has never had an upset yet."

When, whip snapping and bells jingling, he arrives, enveloped in a cloud of dust, at the entrance of a village, he is always received with shouts of welcome.

Arrived at the inn, the stage stops and becomes the center of a group of curious spectators, and when the horses have been stopped, Laric distributes the different parcels: "Your trunk? It has not come yet. Here are the three yards of blue cloth. You? Oh, it's the watch you entrusted me to have repaired by M. Dubois—here it is."

And holding pieces of money between his teeth, he pays out, receives and makes change, having good news for some and bad for others. Then he whistles to his horses and the coach moves on, along the highway which runs between fields of green flooded with sunlight, while Laric, singing the while, with his whip cuts leaves here and there from the bordering trees.

For some time, however, Laric's happiness has vanished, and there is a reason for it. Had not M. Martel, who was born in this country, but had lived a long time in one of the great cities, conceived the idea of returning to Saint-Maurice and establishing an automobile service between that town and Orange, with the object of supplanting the old-fashioned stage-coach?

Laric's anxiety was fully justified; the new vehicle accomplished the entire distance in one hour and a half, including stops, while the stage-coach could not do it in less than three. As soon as the new machine arrives at a place it is ready to start away without a moment's delay; its horses do not have to be rubbed down nor rest. As for its food, that is quickly provided, it devours that as it does the miles.

At first the peasants hesitated, but were finally won over to the new invention, notwithstanding all that Laric could say or do. Travelers crowded into the machine, for, besides the question of time, the owner of the automobile only charged a franc instead of a franc and a half.

Laric, in order not to be beaten, lowered his price. Then, M. Martel did the same. From one franc they respectively dropped to ninety centimes, to eighty, to sixty, to fifty; here they stopped. A few of the older inhabitants still stood by Laric, but everyone knew that he could not make enough to pay his expenses. M. Martel asked him one day if he would sell out; he would pay him something handsome to abandon his coach. Laric refused. M. Martel then informed him that, besides the fact that he would not hesitate to put the fare still lower, he was going to make two trips a day and establish an express service for trunks and merchandise, which hitherto had been left entirely to the stage-coach.

One night the stage-coach returned empty, without a traveler, without a package.

Laric had been obstinate, and he is ruined. Sorrowfully he was making the last trip. He had not been willing to bow before the logical consequences of the eternal struggle between routine and progress. He looked sadly at the heavy clouds that were rolling up from the horizon. He has just received the final blow: M. Martel has taken away from him the mail contract. It is the end. Good-bye to the exquisite landscape that used to pass before his eyes like a panorama, good-bye to the views of far horizons bordered by the majestic, glittering Alps that dominate the country of Ventoux.

The heat is suffocating. Little by little nightfall and the storm come closer.

Suddenly there rises a cold wind which sweeps up the dust in front of the horses.

Above him roll and writhe sinister looking clouds, gray, green and black; the light becomes livid; and the fields seem to shiver, while the frightened birds dart hither and thither, fleeing before the storm. Suddenly there is a blinding flash of lightning immediately followed by a tremendous explosion, and then down comes the rain, pouring like a cataract. Laric, his face whipped by the sharp gusts of wind and the rain drops, his eyes dazed by the lightning, thinks of the automobile which is behind him; he remembers that it will overtake him as usual at Croisiere, although it left Orange an hour after he did. Oh, could the lightning only strike it, and annihilate it!

Beyond, in the dark, there is the bridge of Jourmont; the rising of the water must be high now, for the river is transformed into a torrent after an ordinary shower, and a storm so violent as this rarely occurs.

Suddenly the horses of Laric rear up and will not advance, notwithstanding his words and the snapping of his whip; impatient, he descends from his box and, taking one of the side lanterns, goes ahead to see what may be the cause of their strange action.

Horror! Before him lies a yawning gulf. The bridge has been carried away by the rising flood.

With an expression of satanic joy, Laric remounts the box and, turning his horses, gallops away along a side road which runs parallel with the river and leads to Ville Maune, where there is a bridge, which, though it was built by the Romans, must still be standing, and which will lead him to Saint-Maurice. It is true that he will not pass through Jourmont, but what difference does that make? This is his last trip.

Laric, laughing horribly, threw these words to the furious wind: "We will see now, old Martel, whether your horses will have sense enough to avoid the danger."

Notwithstanding its two acetylene lamps, it is almost impossible for the chauffeur of the automobile to see more than twenty feet ahead of him. The weather is certainly frightful; it is a storm which will long be remembered and talked of by the peasants in these valleys. Notwithstanding the rumbling of the thunder and the whistling of the winds, one could hear the regular stroke of the pistons. All is well. In the car there are nine people, who have the pleasure of witnessing this storm without being incommoded by it. But just behind the automobile, and trying to keep up with it, is a bicyclist, peddling furiously. At every flash of lightning the people in the car can see his face wet with perspiration and rain, and his lips are curved in physical anguish.

And now suddenly, there is nothing! All gone, automobile and bicycle rider! In the howling of the tempest no one heard the crash.

Soon thereafter the wind went down, the rain stopped and from behind the fast receding clouds there rose the moon, pure and brilliant, in the dark blue vault of the heavens.

The next day, at dawn, Laric, returned to the place of the catastrophe, irresistibly attracted by that psychological necessity which urges the criminal to return to the scene of his crime, and he quietly began to assist in the search for the corpses.

He was received in silence and with many side glances, for so pale and haggard was he that the people believed that "he knew." Suddenly his eyes became fixed in horror, as he saw a corpse drawn out of the mud by two peasants. The body was dressed in the blue uniform of the rural postal service. He recognized his son, who was postman at Jourmont, and the single traveler in the automobile, who had been saved almost by a miracle, said: "Ah, yes, that is the postman who was following the auto on a bicycle."

It seems that before the storm he had been sent to carry a special message to Donzac.

The traveler did not finish. Laric had fallen dead on the body of his son.

Anesthetics Fifty Years Ago

An Account of the Wonder With Which the Use of Chloroform and Ether Was Regarded—Potions Used by the Ancients to Produce Insensibility—Mesmerism in India and Europe

By Robert McTavish

Medicine and surgery are always in a transitory state, new discoveries made year by year bringing about a constant change in treatment and method. At present the joining of severed arteries is being accomplished, legs from one animal having been grafted to where the leg had been on another; which gives rise to the belief that within a decade or so the grafting of human limbs may be done with complete certainty. In half a century from now the magazine articles that are being written regarding these attempts will be read with more or less amusement, and we will be looked upon as rather a benighted people, amateurs in the curing of physical ills.

So it is that with more or less amusement one reads now of the wonder with which anesthetics were regarded fifty years ago. The Westminster Review for January, 1859, devoted many pages to the use of chloroform and ether, telling of the success that had attended operations performed on patients under its influence. The first man to submit to ether, according to the Review, was one Eben H. Frost, who had a tooth pulled by Dr. W. G. T. Morgan, of Boston. This was on September 30, 1846. Dr. Morton and others had been experimenting with ether, having been led to investigate it through experimenting with gas, which had been pronounced a failure. Morton was told by Dr. Charles Jackson that ether had the same effect as gas. He courageously tried it on himself, with the result that he was totally unconscious for several minutes. Enthusiastic over his success, he sent messengers out into the streets of Boston, commissioning them to pay five dollars for subjects. They sought all day in vain. At last Frost was found. He was suffering the pangs of hunger and the anguish of an aching tooth. Evidently thinking that he might as well be dead as living under the double affliction, he submitted to the ether. The pulling of the tooth was a complete success, Frost knowing nothing of it until he recovered consciousness.

Following this experiment, many successful operations were performed, and the news quickly spread to England, where ether met with great favor. In fact, Morton and Jackson were more honored abroad than at home. Medical papers in this country heaped all sorts of abuse on them. The New York Medical Journal announced that "the last special wonder has already arrived at the natural term of its existence. It has descended to the bottom of that great abyss which has already engulphed so many of its predecessor novelties, but which continues also to gape for more until a humbug yet more prime shall be thrown into it." The New Orleans Medical Journal exclaimed: "That the leading surgeons of Boston could be captivated by such an invention as this excites our amazement." A leading medical periodical in Philadelphia thus expressed its skepticism: "We should not consider it entitled to the least notice, but that we perceive, by a Boston Journal, that prominent members of the profession have been caught in its meshes." It was fully persuaded that "the surgeons of Philadephia would not be seduced from the high professional path of dutv into the quagmire of quackery by this Will-o'-the-wisp." The British journals took the other view. Ether was taken up by one English physician after another, and was hailed as one of the greatest boons of mankind.

Then in 1847 M. Flourens related to the French Academy the results of experiments on animals that had inhaled the fumes of pure chloroform, which had been known since 1831, when an American chemist produced it by a distillation of a mixture of chloride of lime and alcohol. Flourens reported that chloroform induced complete insensibility for a considerable time. But he did not believe it a safe agent. However, it was used by Professor Simpson several months later in a case of childbirth. From this time on both ether and chloroform were employed in operations, each anesthetic having its defenders as the most safe. In some place the use of either or both were forbidden as dangerous to human life. Also, many physicians refused for a long time to use them, giving various reasons, among the most curious of which was that pain being a natural element any abolition of it was wrong—a sort of flying in the face of Providence. In fact, ether and chloroform were the subjects of many disputes for years after their introduction. For that matter, complaint is made today that physicians are not sufficiently familiar with their properties. Sir Augustus Waller, a prominent English physician now lecturing at the University of California, stated last week that many patients die in Europe while under the influence of chloroform, and that in numerous cases death is caused by ignorance on the part of the physicians using the anesthetic.

Although chloroform and ether were not used until half a century ago, for many centuries various potions had been given for the alleviation of pain. The Greeks and Romans used the roots of the mandrake steeped in wine. According to Pliny this decoction was given "for injuries inflicted by serpents and before incisions and punctures made in the body, in order to insure insensibility to pain. Indeed, for this last purpose, by some persons, the odour of it is quite sufficient to induce sleep." Apuleius states in reference to mandrake: "If one is to have a limb mutilated, burnt, or sawn, he may drink half an ounce, with wine, and while he sleeps the member may be cut off without any pain or sense."

From a work by Theodoric, a pupil of Dominicus Hugo, who lived in Italy during the last half of the thirteenth century, the following extract is taken:

"The making of a flavor for performing surgical operations according to Dominicus Hugo. It is thus made: Take of opium, of the juice of the unripe mulberry, of hyocyamus, of the juice of hemlock, of the juice of the leaves of mandragora (mandrake), of the juice of the wood ivy, of the juice of the forest mulberry, of the seeds of lettuce, of the seeds of the dock which has a large round apple (cicuta), each an ounce; mix all these in a brazen vessel, and then place in it a new sponge; let the whole boil, as long as the sun lasts on the dog-days, until the sponge consumes it all and it is

Rev. David Evans, Versesmith

I do not think it is generally known that Rev. David J. Evans, pastor of Grace church, takes an occasional canter over the fields of asphodel on the back of that treacherous steed called Pegasus. If this be news to a world ever ready to hail another climber of the Parnassian steeps, let mine be the pleasing task of introducing Dr. Evans who twangs Apollo's lyre but wears the discreet and decent soutane in place of the lyric god's scanty draperies. I was not aware that the rector of fashionable Grace Church flirted with the muse until a copy of the Grace Church Pastoral, the parish leaflet, came to my hands. There, over the modest initials, "D. J. E.", I read the following:

> Down Market Street the serried thousands strode
> Of Labor's sons in brawny regiments,
> And at their head a demagogue there rode > Personifying blatant consequence.
> Banners and emblems heralded each Trade,
> While music filled the air from pipe and tabor,
> But sweetly clear amid the great parade,
> I heard, "Come unto me, all ye that labor."

At the metrical quality of these lines I am not going to cavil. I have long suspected, merely from casual contact with Dr. Evans, that his reverence wooed the elusive sprite of poesy, but I know not how long he has toiled over the hard road of metre where so many have stumbled. It may be that Dr. Evans is a tyro at versesmithing. His meter is unruffled, his rhymes carefully matched and there is a hint of imaginative warmth, not to say of poetic frenzy in the lines; witness the introduction of pipes and tabors into the ranks that followed the personification of blatant consequence. The allusion I suspect is to the Hon. P. H. McCarthy. The language is strong and from a clergyman rather surprising. A poet, no doubt, may infer the qualities of the mind from the mere exterior, but is a rector justified in exercising this poetic license? The poet of Grace Church ends his versicles with one of the sweetest lines from Holy Writ, doubtless to obtain the effect of strong contrast, much sought by bards; for it is a long leap from the bitterness of the third and fourth lines to the comfort of the concluding verse. Perhaps Dr. Evans, like other budding versesmiths, was wafted away from charity by the divine afflatus.

Braves and Their Breakfast

From a period so remote that the eldest of us can scarcely remember when they were not, annual bull's-head breakfasts have been occurring under the glorious auspices of the Iroquois Club, the most venerable, if not the most venerated, of all California political organizations consecrated to the conservation of the interests of estimable job-chasers. By a happy and altogether unpremeditated coincidence these annual bovine feasts of reason and streamings of soul invariably synchronize with the cavortings of candidates for public office. A felicitous coincidence this because otherwise some of the choicest cuts of the bull's head would go to waste. It is only when the sap of ambition is bounding beneath the skin of your amiable job-chaser that he hungers for the meat of the bull and exults at the prospect of foregathering beneath the sun with the solemn braves of the Iroquois Club and attesting his devotion to the principles upheld by them through the medium of that elective franchise which makes of each of us a king. This year's breakfast occurred last Sunday at Fairfax, and it was attended by some notable persons; also by every member of the Iroquois Club expectant of a job, which means that there was a full attendance, for every Iroquois brave is either actually engaged in taxeating or hungering for the fodder that is dispensed at the public crib.

A Gumshoe Moralist

Perhaps the most notable guest of the club at this year's breakfast was the Hon. William J. Burns, the Corentin of the present dispensation. This distinguished gumshoe artist and celebrated spy was introduced as the feature of the occasion, the event of the breakfast, somewhat more important than the bull's head itself. As it was the first time in the history of the club that a human bloodhound was deemed sufficiently palatable to serve as a side dish at an Iroquois breakfast, Mr. Burns, as may be easily imagined, occasioned no small flutter of interest. The celebrated spy, be it known, was not introduced merely as a lay figure. As such he would have been sufficiently diverting, but he was invited to heighten the moral ecstasy of the occasion, and this he did by explaining the importance to San Francisco of the election of Mr. Heney. It was evident that he spoke from his heart which bleeds for the unuplifted and will continue to do so while the Spreckels leg remains accessible and retains its elasticity. The election of Mr. Heney means much to Mr. Burns, and he discussed it with a rich and mellow eloquence touching responsive chords in the hearts of many of his enraptured hearers, for the Iroquois Club is full of prophets of public righteousness who are heartily in sympathy with everybody engaged in the exploitation of a good thing.

Back to Life

The Iroquois breakfast was a success from every conceivable standpoint. Gastronomically it was all that the most fastidious epicure could expect; as a symposium it was edifying; the intellect was refreshed, the heart was elevated. No wonder that Max Popper, the great chief of the tribe, beamed with gratification on his bravelets. Max was the toastmaster of the occasion. He introduced with grace a succession of unbridled speeches seasoned with references to the glorious democracy, and himself indulged in one of his characteristic dizzy flights of eloquence. In this day and generation the Popper does not flourish as formerly in the affections of the people, not that he no longer merits the meed of their esteem, but that he has survived the memory of the oldest inhabitant. Like "Whiskers" Joe O'Connor the Popper comes down to us from that memorable epoch that was marked by the triumphs of Chris. Buckley, of whom he was a pampered protege, and in the light of whose genius for converting public trusts into private snaps he basked and prospered. Through the kindness of Buckley the Popper battened on several profitable public contracts, and when after many fat years came the lean the great Iroquois brave folded his bespangled tent and silently stole away to Europe to enjoy the leisure he had so richly earned. In the days of his political activity the Popper was the valiant champion of the people's cause, his partnership with the odious Buckley to the contrary notwithstanding. He hated grafters as he hates them now, with an unquenchable hatred, but once upon a time when he had the street sweeping contract he was obliged to assume a tolerant attitude toward certain vulgar persons who were animated by vicious principles. As a consequence the stalwart reformer involved himself in a scandal. He was summoned before the Grand Jury and questioned about certain rumors of bribery, and tradition has it that he was suddenly struck dumb. Tradition also has it that on that occasion the valiant Popper availed himself of a certain statute which safeguards the citizen against self-incrimination. How unfortunate there were no immunity baths in those days! Was Popper held up? I do not think so, for he is a man of good taste and as the victim of a hold-up he would not have introduced the Hon. Francis J. Heney last Sunday as "the best example of an honest, courageous citizen."

Why Journalists Are Cynical

I have been frequently charged with cynicism. I hope the charge is unfounded, but were I to be convicted of it I should plead in mitigation of judgment that for many years I have been on more or less intimate terms with reformers. There is Governor Pardee, for example, as ardent a reformer as Max Popper or Francis J. Heney. With the record of Pardee I am as familiar as with the record of Heney; with what has been published of it and with much that has not; and consequently I view the activities of Pardee in the guise of a reformer, with a somewhat cynical air. Last Sunday my contemporary, the Knave of the Oakland Tribune, contributed to the written history of latter day politics a story of the Santa Cruz convention. The story is about a delegate whose vote Pardee obtained by promising to get his son out of San Quentin, one of the few promises that he kept. The story is an old one, but it was given to the public for the first time last Sunday. Suppose that such stories were as accessible to the public as they are to journalists, how many cynics would there be in the world?

"Are you certain you can cook well?"

"Madam, I worked two years for the world's greatest tenor. At the last dinner he gave I was applauded after each course, and at the end of the dinner I was recalled three times."

Alfred Douglas' Sonnets

Lord Alfred Douglas, at present editor of the Academy, a weekly paper of London which has been ranked with the Saturday Review, but more widely notorious as that son of the Marquis of Queensbury who was infamously implicated in the Oscar Wilde debacle, has just issued a little volume of sonnets. This, of course, is not Douglas' first literary venture. His previous activities have ranged from the translation into English of Salome (which, with some assistance from Marcel Schwob, Wilde wrote in French for Sarah Bernhardt), to the inditing of the Pongo Papers, a series of anemic humorous poems. Those who recall the revelations which clustered about the trial of Wilde will remember that Douglas, at that early age, was no mean master of sonnet technique although the content of those curious effusions placed them beyond the pale of criticism. But all that belongs to a miserable past, and British reviewers show a willingness to appraise the new book on its intrinsic merit. That Douglas was not too confident of this when he published is indicated by a note appended to the sonnets in which he anticipates for his latest work "homage given grudgingly from cautious mouths" or no homage at all. His anticipation has not been realized. London reviewers declare that there is no man living able to produce a book of sonnets quite so flawless in their grace and music.

The Note of Self Pity

Criticism, however, cannot overlook the insistence of Douglas upon his past sufferings. There is a strain of querulousness in the book that spoils some of the best of the sonnets, a strain of querulousness which may or may not be forgiven in a man who admits that he has "fought with beasts and wrestled with despair." Certainly it must be deplored for the poetry's sake, even aside from all question of good taste. Douglas is least happy when he becomes most personal. As one of Douglas's critics has pointed out, the personal note is difficult to strike with the unerring precision that is required to send it home to the ear and to the mind in the true fulness of its appeal. In a sonnet it is impossible to separate content and expression. If the content is crude; or if, even though it be sincere, it appears on the face of it to lack sincerity, the sonnet is hopelessly marred. When Douglas says:

> I have enticed and merited distress
> By this, that I have never bowed the knee
> Before the shrine of wise hypocrisy,
> Nor worn self-righteous anger like a dress—

he betrays an artificiality which exacts its penalty in self-contradiction. To repudiate self-righteousness in poetic numbers is to invite the charge, if not of self-righteousness, then of something even less poetic, namely, self-pity. And that is what Douglas has done.

Teddy's Hunting Library

When President Eliot of Harvard bestirred himself, with a blare of advertising trumpets, to the selection of the books essential for liberal culture, he managed to compress his chosen volumes into a few feet of library space. And when one of our greatest men was asked what books he would take along if he faced shipwreck on a desert island, he replied that he would be content with the Bible and Shakespeare. But when our strenuous ex-president hied him to Africa for a few months' hunting, the demands of a voracious literary appetite would not be satisfied with less than fifty volumes, covering pretty nearly every department of artistic expression. With that charming weakness for publicity which the great Bwana Tumbo has never tried to overcome, he has seen fit to publish the titles of his hunting library, whether impelled thereto by jealousy of the notoriety which has been bestowed upon Eliot or for the diffusion of culture, must remain an open question.

From Homer to Huckleberry Finn

The crassly ignorant who have imagined that the strenuosity of a hunting trip undertaken not merely for sport's sake but also for the enrichment of science, would leave little time for reading of a purely literary kind, must now acknowledge their mistake. After a day spent in the jungle the indefatigable Teddy returns to camp with sufficient energy, not only to pen an editorial for Dr. Abbott's paper and a few thousand words for Scribner's, but also to enjoy the zest of the Faerie Queene, the Federalist, the Bigelow Papers, Dante, Milton and Euripides. When these well-thumbed tomes have been devoured he finds the stimulus of a literary nightcap in Huckleberry Finn or the Biblical Apocrypha; and for the wakeful moments of his couch, if there are any, there is the Nibelungenlied quite handy or the night light may shed its pale gleam over Marlowe or George Borrow or Mahan's Sea Power. It is true the ex-president has explained that some of the books are Kermit's selections, but may we not surmise that that young nimrod, if he finds time for literary diversion, confines himself to Bret Harte or Poe or the great Sir Walter? Certainly it would be a safe bet that he has not dallied long under the African sky with the Faerie Queene; but then I have my doubts whether his esteemed father has ever gone beyond the description of Una and the "gentil knighte."

A Shocking Breach of Faith

Frequently have we been told that Clarence Mackey is the son of his father, a man of fine instincts and above everything that is sordid and mean. If this appraisement of him is correct a decision rendered recently by the Federal Court of Appeals must have overwhelmed him with shame and humiliation. For young Mackey is head and front of the Postal Telegraph Company, and that corporation has just been convicted of very dishonorable practices. From the decision of the Court of Appeals it must be inferred that Mr. Mackey has surrounded himself with men who have no very keen sense of honor or decency. The decision was rendered in a suit instituted by the Postal Telegraph Company for $300,000. This sum the company demanded as a salvage bonus for getting the steamship Manchuria off Makapu reef in the Hawaiian Islands in August, 1906. When that disaster occurred several vessels went to the assistance of the Manchuria, but the Restorer was not one of them though she was lying idle in the harbor of Honolulu. Though summoned to the aid of the stranded ship the captain of the Restorer refused to go, whereupon Mr. E. H. Harriman was communicated with in New York, and he immediately called on Mr. Mackey who consented that the Restorer should be put at the service of the Pacific Mail. A message was sent to Honolulu over the Postal Cable instructing the representatives of the Underwriters to employ the Restorer, and it was clear from this message that the ship was to be employed not on a salvage basis but for reasonable compensation based on actual cost incurred in rendering service. Mr. Harriman had said in one of his despatches that the Postal company was under obligations to the Pacific Mail, and it was evident that he had the impression that Mackey and his associates were doing him a friendly turn. Some months later there came a rude awakening; the Postal Telegraph Company demanded a salvage bonus of $300,000, computed of course on a salvage basis. The claim was repudiated and the suit quickly followed. The officers of the Pacific Mail and the Underwriters regarded the conduct of the Postal Telegraph Company as contemptible, but not till the trial of the case did they form an adequate conception of the meanness of the Mackey corporation.

Mercenary Tactics

During the trial the defendants succeeded in bringing to light a large number of despatches that were sent from the New York office of the Postal company to the captain of the Restorer at the time the Manchuria was on the reef. From these despatches it appeared that from the beginning the Postal Telegraph Company secretly contemplated exacting a salvage bonus. Conscious the while that the owners of the Manchuria and the Underwriters believed that the Restorer was employed on a basis of actual cost of services, the mercenary officers of the Postal company were taking every precaution necessary to give strength and validity to a claim for bonus. The captain of the Restorer was instructed from New York to be careful in every way to enhance the value of his services on a salvage basis and to hire the best admiralty lawyer in Honolulu in order to safeguard his position as a salvor. The captain of the Restorer, eager to gratify his employers, tried to persuade Captain Metcalfe who was in charge of the work of saving the Manchuria, to permit him to pull her off the reef long before the arrival of the wrecking gear. He even insisted on doing so, and threatened to withdraw if not permitted. He said he was willing to take a chance, which meant that he was willing to have the Manchuria lightened, the inevitable result of which in the event of failure, according to Captain Metcalfe, would have been the further embarrassment of the stranded vessel. The haste of the Restorer's captain was of course inspired by the desire to save the Manchuria without any assistance. He wished to be justified in claiming the whole bonus. By the trial court the plaintiff was given judgment for $60,000, just $240,000 less than the sum demanded, and now comes the Court of Appeals with a judgment for only $30,000.

the opinion of the court. This is an excerpt from the opinion:

"There was not only this bad faith on the part of the libelant, but its action throughout was not only calculated and mercenary in the extreme, but was entirely lacking in those elements which often induce courts of admiralty to make awards at times greatly exceeding the expenses, losses and actual value of the salvor's services. A salvor, said the court in the case of The Howard, 12 Fed. Cas. 630, 633, 'who, regardless of personal considerations, gallantly rushes into dangers to preserve the lives and property of others when exposed to the horrors of shipwreck, or he who promptly goes forward and contributes his aid when he believes his services will be beneficial in preventing impending loss, without stopping to inquire what amount in dollars and cents his exertions will bring to his own pocket, will always receive that liberal reward for his services which it is the policy of the law to allow, and which courts feel pleasure in awarding to generous and manly conduct; while he who holds back and quietly looks on at approaching ruin until his own services become indispensable to the preservation of the property he sees exposed, with the expectation that his reward will thereby be increased in proportion to the increased dangers from which the property is ultimately rescued, will find that he is disappointed in the realization of his golden hopes, and that a display of avarice at such a time renders him an object of contumely and reproach.'"

What Mr. Clarence Mackey thinks of having his cable company thus judicially characterized I have not heard; but certainly he must realize that from the merely commercial standpoint a rather severe blow has been dealt the corporation that was founded by his distinguished father.

She—Papa doesn't want us to be married for ten years yet. But don't look so worried, George; you will still be young ten years from now.

He—Yes, darling; but I wasn't thinking of myself.

Colonel Pippy's Realistic Boosting

There exists in San Francisco a club known as the Rotary. It is composed of men in all lines of business, with the curious provision that no occupation shall have more than one representative. Thus, but one grocer, or one cigar dealer, or one contractor, can belong. The club has a dinner once a month at which each member is allowed to deliver a ten minute address telling of the excellence of his wares and why he should be patronized. Colonel George Pippy is the only milkman who belongs, and his eloquence in boosting his wares received a high tribute the other day. A member of the club rallied by a friend on his gloomy expression, in explanation said: "Well, I'm full of milk and cream—that is, I feel full of it, which is about the same thing. At the Rotary Club dinner today, Colonel Pippy put in ten minutes telling why we should buy his milk and cream. He was so realistic that I can feel it swashing all around inside of me. I'm a human churn, that's what I am, and all I need to do is to jump up and down a little to be full of butter."

Pyrotechnic Display Foiled

Had it not been for Fire Marshal Towe the display of electricity and fireworks at the laying of the cornerstone of the new Bohemian Club Building on Saturday night would have been one of the most elaborate and magnificent ever seen in San Francisco. The plans were prepared by Edward Duffy, who always has charge of such displays at the Bohemian Jinks in the redwoods. To Duffy there is nothing on earth that compares with the Bohemian Club, and as a consequence he could imagine nothing too good for the Saturday night's celebration. So Duffy went at his preparations with great enthusiasm, evolving, in addition to the electrical pieces, volcanoes, huge rockets, set pieces, pin wheels and blazers of huge proportions. In his mind's eye Duffy saw the slopes of Nob Hill in a blaze of light that would be a beacon to the country for many miles around. Having, with loving care, completed his plans, he took them to Fire Marshal Towe. That official, after looking them over, spoke in this wise: "Now, Duffy, these are mighty fine, and I do not doubt that the people on Mars would be able to see the blaze; and for that reason it would be a great contribution to science. But there is too much danger of fire. Understand, Duffy, I do not want to appear narrow-minded. I would not object to the burning up of a few blocks of houses. But really I can't allow you to destroy the city just as we have got it built up again." So Duffy, disconsolate, was obliged to modify his plans, with the consequence that to his distressed mind the display looked like an eighty-five cent family Fourth of July celebration on the front lawn.

Mrs. Atherton and the Examiner

When Lord Northcliffe was in town last week, he said many complimentary things about California writers, most of his laudatory comments finding their way into the papers. But there was one compliment which he paid to a California writer that has so far remained unpublished. Lord Northcliffe, being as much a newspaperman now as when his name was plain Alfred Harmsworth, read all that was written about himself and called attention to the fact that this particular compliment was not put into print; so the matter becomes one of interest, if not of importance. To the Examiner reporter who interviewed him on his arrival Lord Northcliffe stated that Gertrude Atherton was the American novelist most read in England, and he added some very flattering encomiums for the California writer. But not a line of this found its way into the Examiner; there wasn't a word to suggest that Lord Northcliffe had paid handsome tribute to the author of "Ancestors." Lord Northcliffe met Mrs. Atherton the next day and mentioned the circumstance to her as rather curious. I do not know whether Mrs. Atherton attempted any explanation of the omission, but I think I can supply one. It is simply this. Mrs. Atherton has little admiration for the Examiner or any of the Hearst papers; their methods do not accord with her conception of journalism. So she has never favored them with special articles, refusing repeatedly to accept tempting offers for contributions. When Mrs. Atherton has anything to say to the local newspaper public, you may have noticed that she uses another organ as her medium of expression. So the Examiner is sore and is exacting tit for tat by suppressing Lord Northcliffe's compliment.

LORD NORTHCLIFFE AT THE PRESS CLUB

The proprietor of the Thunderer spent two hours at the newspapermen's club house during his recent visit here. The steins indicate the character of the refreshments served. Lord Northcliffe is in the middle of the third row from the top of the picture.

The Exacting Northcliffe

In an interview given to a morning paper, Lord Northcliffe said that he would not have a reporter who could not speak French and write shorthand. The latter qualification he looked upon as absolutely necessary that accurate reports of speeches might be made. It is a good thing that his lordship did not learn of some of the methods of San Francisco reporters regarding the taking of speeches, else he would have been shocked out of his British imperturbability. For be it known that in this city when an experienced newspaperman goes to a political meeting he does not even take the trouble to make a longhand report of the addresses. He jots down a few notes, then when he gets back to the office writes a speech around them—and a whole lot better speech, as a rule, than the average politican can deliver. But the politician, on reading the paper the next morning, always believes that the words are his. An incident illustrating this occurred up in Willows once. Dr. W. A. Sehorn, editor of the Willows Journal, having been out of town on Admission Day did not hear the speech delivered at the celebration by a leading politican. He expected to see the speaker the next day and get from him a copy of his address, but failed to do so. As a consequence when noon-time came, with the paper almost ready for press, he was lacking the principal feature of the day—the spread-eagle address. While he was pondering the situation the San Francisco papers arrived. In them he found the speech delivered at San Jose the day before by D. M. Delmas. Sehorn did not hesitate an instant. Grabbing his faithful shears he clipped the Delmas oration, and it appeared in the Journal as the one delivered in Willows. Sehorn was approached the next day by the local politician, who thanked him fervently for printing his speech in full.

Cutler Reports Speech

A somewhat different experience once fell to the lot of Fletcher Cutler, attorney for the Regents of the State University. While Cutler was district attorney of Humboldt County he went out to a neighboring town, Ferndale, to deliver the Fourth of July oration. The next day he was passing the office of the local paper when he was summoned inside by the editor. "Look here, Cutler," said the man of type, "I'm too busy to write anything about your speech. Suppose you get me up an account of it." "Great chance," said Cutler. So he went at it with enthusiasm. He wrote nearly a column about the magnificent oratorical effort of Fletcher A. Cutler. When the editor had read it he said: "That's all right, as far as it goes, but you haven't got in anything about the peroration"—for the peroration of a Fourth of July speech is the supreme test in the country, and its fervor and word-painting make or mar the reputation of the speaker. So, admonished, Cutler went to work once more, and added to his story: "The peroration to Mr. Cutler's speech was one of the most glorious pieces of word-painting that has ever been heard in Humboldt County. With beautiful imagery, and in words that pulsated with the most ardent patriotism, Mr. Cutler fairly swept his hearers off their feet, and sustained his reputation as one of the most magnificent public speakers of the day." "There," said Cutler, when he had finished—"if you want more gush than that you will have to write it yourself." That perfervid column from the country weekly has an honored place in Cutler's scrap book—and not because of vanity, but by reason of his keen sense of humor.

Northcliffe is Democratic

To return to Lord Northcliffe—when he visited the Press Club on the last day of his stay in San Francisco, he revealed himself as one of the most democratic of peers. He came unattended, and he wore a rough business suit, a negligee shirt, and a battered slouch hat that must have cost about two and six. Some of the members had donned frock coats for the occasion, and one even sported a silk hat. But none of that for Northcliffe. He announced that he had come up to be one of the fellows, and he soon demonstrated his ability in that line. He drank beer with the greatest relish, told stories, listened appreciatively to the ones told him, made a speech, had his picture taken, was made an honorary member of the club—and altogether proved himself a good fellow. Physically Northcliffe is a fine type of British manhood—strong, sturdy, the picture of health. He radiates vigor of mind and body, and his ringing laugh could be heard all over the club rooms. He is but little more than forty years old, yet is the greatest newspaper publisher in the world. Moreover, he is entirely self-made, starting in as a reporter, then establishing a weekly paper, and gradually extending his operations until now he controls the London Times, Mail, Express, and a score of other publications. He was plain Alfred Harmsworth until some two or three years ago.

when he was knighted. He has made the Mail one of the yellowest of British journals, but keeps the Times within the old traditions. His connection with it, however, has impaired its prestige. Several years ago, when the Mail had just assumed its saffron tinge, it offered $10,000 for the identification of an automobilist who had killed a child in the North of England while going through a village at terriffic speed. The offender was caught—and he turned out to be Harmsworth's brother. The reward was paid without a murmur.

From the Jaws of Death

The history of the case of William Buckley who has just emerged from the shadow of the gallows abounds in dramatic incidents. And like all history it is philosophy teaching by example, the lesson to be gleaned from it being that when human life is at stake the law cannot be too strictly construed in the interest of the person in jeopardy. William Buckley was tried for the murder of George W. Rice, a non-union man who was killed during the machinists' strike eight years ago. There is no doubt that he was at the scene of the murder or that he went there in the company of union men who joined in the attack on Rice. But he was not an ardent partisan, nor had he been taking an active part in the strike. According to his own story immediately after his arrest, a story which is now generally believed, he went to the scene of the murder with the expectation of seeing a fist fight. Rice was shot and Buckley, as was quite natural in the circumstances, took to his heels with the union men and their sympathizers. He told the police that he could prove that his story was true by the testimony of the men who accompanied him to the scene of the murder. Unhesitatingly he gave their names and they were at once arrested, and they were convicted without any other evidence than that which Buckley supplied. All were sentenced to terms of imprisonment. Two of them, Thomas Moran and Edward Duncan, are now in the penitentiary, and the third, Charles Donnelly, is in a convict's grave at Folsom.

The Guilty Man Escaped

Behind the prosecution of Buckley there was powerful influence, and from the beginning it was apparent that there was a strong determination to send somebody to the gallows for the salutary effect that such an example of the implacability of the law might have. The Hon. Frank H. Dunne was the presiding judge of the Superior Court at that time, and he sent Buckley to his doom in the tribunal that is presided over by Judge William P. Lawlor. Buckley was prosecuted by special counsel and for the prosecution there were three witnesses who identified the defendant as the murderer. One of these witness was a boy of fifteen, another was a precocious school girl, the daughter of the third witness Walter J. Piatt. At the trial the Piatt girl was not produced. For some reason she was permitted to go to Mexico, but Judge Lawlor, despite the strenuous opposition of counsel for the defense, permitted the reading to the jury of the testimony which had been given by the girl at the preliminary examination. Counsel therefore had no opportunity to cross-examine her. Buckley was convicted February 7, 1902, and sentenced to death. As soon as the verdict was announced eyewitnesses to the murder, horror-stricken at the thought of an innocent man going to his death on the gallows, came forward and gave their testimony. It was then learned that the murderer was a man named Copeland, who disappeared immediately after the shooting. The police have never ben able to find him.

Murphy's Motion

On the strength of the newly discovered evidence Buckley's attorney, Frank J. Murphy, whose persistency in the long fight for his client's life is almost without parallel in the records of our criminal courts, presented to Judge Lawlor a large number of affidavits in support of a motion for a new trial. He was confident the motion would be granted, for it seemed to him incredible that in the light of the evidence before him Judge Lawlor would assume so grave a responsibility as that of resolving against a man on the road to the gallows what certainly appeared to be a reasonable doubt of his guilt. But Judge Lawlor is made of stern stuff. He has the courage of his convictions and he is proud that they far outnumber the acquittals that have occurred in his court. He denied the motion and Murphy collapsed from amazement.

The "Weak Brother" Faltered

Attorney Murphy appealed the case to the Supreme Court, but the tribunal could not interfere because Judge Lawlor had resolved a question of fact against the defendant. Then followed a long series of maneuvers to delay the execution pending efforts to obtain commutation of sentence. Buckley was to be hanged November 16, 1904. On November 15 Murphy appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and he reached San Quentin with a certified copy of the stay of execution at dusk. The gallows had been constructed and preparations had been made to hang Buckley in the morning at 9 o'clock. Pending the appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States Governor Pardee was petitioned for commutation, but he was disinclined to incur the disfavor of the powerful organization that had paid the costs of the prosecution. This disinclination was strengthened by a letter from Judge Lawlor. Then followed the petition to Governor Gillett who examined all the records in the case and read the entire transcript of testimony. While engaged in this laborious work he received a letter from Justice Angellotti who had carefully examined the record in the case at the time of the appeal to the Supreme Court, and who was of the opinion that Buckley's guilt had not been established beyond a reasonable doubt. This letter strongly influenced Governor Gillett, as did also a conversation he had with Detective Thomas Ryan, one of the most conscientious members of the police department. Ryan handled the case for the prosecution, but after hearing the testimony offered in support of the motion for a new trial he concluded that Buckley was innocent; and of this he has been since absolutely convinced.

Great Is de Grassi

In Town Talk of the week before last I gave you my word that Antonio de Grassi, the musicianly young violinist of Oakland, was worth crossing the bay to hear. Good as my word, I went, I heard, and was conquered—critic that I am. In consequence, I must needs take part in the performance myself, and none too subdued a part at that. I gave him a hand, which is the mead, if not the need, of the fine sympathetic artist. I heard de Grassi in the Max Bruch concerto of pleasant memory, and thereafter de Grassi heard me (turn about is fair play), but not individually, the ensemble work of the audience being too good for that. I had, however, not the least desire to play a solo part. First of all, I should have said, I heard him in the Grieg sonata, C minor, and then he, me; and last of all, but not least, in the beautiful Schubert Ave Maria—the fourth encore. Between times, I heard him in like manner in his own truly dreamlike "Im Traume." Throughout the well-balanced program he played his part to perfection; Fred Maurer, accompanist, his; I, mine. What more could the most critical ask? Not a few persons, gifted with kindly natures, but not with discernment, fancy that the present-day critic takes diabolical delight in roasting the poet, the painter, the sculptor, the musician, and the other five servers of the Nine-in-one. Now, as a matter of fact, 'tis the very rarest of pleasures for the critic to praise. He hath no more pleasure in the death of him—more especially, her—that dieth than had that foremost critic, Jehovah of old. Beholding his mother tongue murdered, or the sinful waste of flawless marble, or the great dead such as Beethoven and Mendelssohn misinterpreted, is he in his official capacity to stand supinely smiling by? Is it the fault of the critic that criticizing a performance has come to be synonymous with speaking adversely of it? Great St. Beuve his ghost! Not so.

Another Newspaper School

Although it might be supposed that Joseph Pulitzer, proprietor of the New York World, had plentifully provided for the needs of all young men entertaining the notion of a newspaper career when he gave Columbia University one million dollars with the promise of further assistance to establish a college of journalism, it must be inferred that his ambitious plans did not embrace metropolitan needs, for New York has just acquired another foundation where the journalistic profession will be reduced to academic rules. A department of journalism has been started by the New York University. Courses have been arranged to suit the convenience of the university students, without regard, apparently, to the desires of the great majority of newspapermen who are busiest from 8 until 10 in the evening when the lectures will be given. Every branch of newspaper work is covered, not excepting the law of libel with which most newspapermen of experience have at some time or other come into contact, and the law of copyright which has received new interpretation as the result of the current North Pole controversy. The instructors of the new course include men of practical experience in the newspaper profession, Hotchkiss of the Evening Sun, Atwood of the Press and Professor Lough, formerly of the Wall Street Journal being of the number.

Results Are Problematical

It will be for the editorial writers of the future (who may or may not be trained in colleges of journalism), to decide whether the newspaper profession is to be uplifted by the application of educational methods indispensable to the inculcation of law, medicine and engineering. It will be interesting, too, to learn whether the lecturers employed in the Pulitzer school will train a generation of newspapermen radically different from those who emerge from New York University armed with the precepts of a more reactionary class of journalists. Are we to have yellow newspapermen and conservative newspapermen definitely committed to their standards by the wording of their diplomas? It is doubtful whether many of today's successful newspapermen can be induced to wax enthusiastic over a college of journalism. This may be prejudice; but it is fortified by cunning arguments. Did not Lord Northcliffe, the most powerful newspaperman of the age, tell our Press Club how he became a reporter at fifteen because he had to? And was Joseph Pulitzer's induction into the craft a thing of premeditation strengthened by special instruction? What newspapermen unanimously regard as invaluable training for their work, and most regret the lack of in many instances, is a thoroughgoing knowledge of history, civics and political economy; and these are theoretically a part of every liberal education.

A Supplement Supplemented

A Sunday supplement, that is to say specifically, something miraculous added to a Sabbathic paper to supply its incalculable deficiencies, or correct its myriad egregious errors, has a picture, the most unkindest cut imaginable, of Modern Eve, two-sided, being made over for the fall. Mere man is moved to ask: Is making over necessary for that? The picture, however, is indubitably intended vividly to impress upon us martyrs to beauty the fact that expansion is once more to be the fashion; which moves the patriotic poet, the antonym of mere man, to exclaim:

> Now, Columbia, dear maid,
> The lean ghost has been laid,
> And therewith the sore need of your banting;
> When expanded and weighed
> In the balance of trade,
> I'll go bail that you'll not be found wanting.

Debtor—I hear its your birthday today, Mr. Jones. Many happy returns. May you live till I pay you.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy.

Stocks: The industrial stocks have been given special attention during the past week. United States Steel, Republic Steel and Iron, Central Leather and other industrials went to new high records on improved earnings and future prospects. The coming quarter will show sensational earnings of the United States Steel Corporation. The orders now on the company's books are the largest ever known and the cost of production has been greatly reduced. There seems no checking the upward trend of prices of steel common. I am told by reliable sources that the common shares will pass 100 shortly, also that the price will not stop going up until the common sells higher than the preferred. Bankers are now very friendly in the way of loaning freely on all steel securities giving them stability. The railway list would advance if the powers behind the market would permit. It is more than likely the banking interests will check any attempt to advance values until after December first. On January first over three hundred million dollars will be paid out in the way of dividends; this will necessitate the calling of loans in order to prepare for this emergency. It would be a great benefit to the market should a good decline in prices be experienced. I fully believe that sometime in December, railway and industrial securities will start upon an upward wave that will carry them to a level that will make present prices look cheap. In the meantime a good reaction should come. There is always a bargain day if patience is exercised. When it comes be prepared.

Local Securities: California securities continue to absorb world-wide attention and their position is becoming stronger each day. During the past week their trend, with one or two exceptions, has been toward higher levels and up to the present there is no sign of a letup. In fact, in my opinion, this is only the start of a lasting appreciation of the California security list. Pacific Gas and Electric stocks, especially the common, have been the local leaders as far as outside buying is concerned. The earnings of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company are increasing at a surprising rate and that fact together with the company's surplus of over 2¼ millions make these stocks the most desirable. Pacific Telephone and Telegraph stocks have shown an irregular tone. As I pointed out in last week's letter, the common stock of this company is high enough at present in view of the immediate situation and a recession was bound to occur. Telephone preferred is in quite a different position however, as it pays and will continue to pay 6 per cent on $100 par. This stock has been strongly in favor and has ranged higher. The buying movement that is taking place in California securities is gradually expanding and numerous of the other listed stocks are being taken hold of. Activity and advances have been noticed in Associated Oil, Alaska Packers, Spring Valley Water and City Electric Company. California bonds continue to display a firm tone, especially those representing the Southern California railway companies of which Pacific Electric Railway 5s have developed considerable strength. California Gas and Electric 5s, United Railroads 4s, Pacific Telephone and Telegraph 5s and Spring Valley Water 4s have also changed hands in large blocks. Seeing conditions improving so rapidly in this State, and handling, as I do, so many orders from the East both for information and for offerings of California stocks and bonds, I cannot help but foresee a very active winter for our local list. As far as the immediate trend of the market is concerned, I feel that purchases of Pacific Gas and Electric common and Alaska Packers will be most satisfactory and that Pacific Gas and Electric preferred and Pacific Telephone preferred are two of the cheapest investments in this country at their present quotations.

Cotton: Until his week the belief had been well nigh universal that when cotton began to move from the farms and selling was well in progress, much lower prices would ensue. The argument looked so logical and was so well founded in precedent that it gained wide acceptance, and even to those who were not entirely convinced it seemed plausible and worthy of consideration. It appeared a simple proposition in mathematics, the result being as sure as that the sum of two and two are four. For, was it not true that the farmer would sell rapidly at 12 to 12½ cents and would not his offerings in the usual course of events more than supply the needs of buyers who were holding back waiting these offerings to create a market in which the sellers were many? But although the logic of the situation was unimpeachable, it now appears that the element of supposition about buyers holding back until sellers were keen to trade has failed to materialize and that so far buyers have been almost as anxious as sellers, thus starting at the beginning of the season a keen competition for supplies and a strong spots market. The feature of the week is therefore easily the turn in sentiment reflecting the doubts which have arisen regarding the correctness of the bears' position and it is now believed to be possible that in view of the very small promise for an adequate crop spinners will buy on an advancing market and not wait for lower markets. This is the substantial basis for the rise in prices that has at the close of the week put values nearly $4.00 per bale over the highest of the year. The equinoctial storm, which struck the cotton belt on Monday, was of material aid to bulls and was made the immediate cause for the rapid advance. A tinge of the romantic and a dash of the spectacular was also added by the intelligence flashed over the wires that the late wheat king, James A. Patten, had arrived in New York, and would personally assume control of the market and direct the forces of the bulls. At once interest was aroused among the casual lookers on and the mediocre speculative element who are never so happy as when basking in the sunlight of a leader's glory. They live in a land of knight errantry and are always ready to attach themselves to the retinue of a new and promising sovereign or will follow an old and battered leader if he can get a new dress and a good mount. But it is at best an undesirable horde, and when large constitutes a constant menace to the market. If Mr. Patten sees fit to undertake a bull campaign and invites the public in directly or indirectly, he will get just such a following and at prices which have not been equaled since the Sully year. In fact, if he assumes the roll of major bull the case will be a parallel to the Sully year, with the exception that the grand advance did not begin that year until the onrush of the fall movement had about spent its force. This fact of the impending movement and the fear that with a high market it would be greatly accelerated has made many who are ultimate bulls hold off, and the saying has become current that it was at least a month too soon to begin a bull campaign. It is the brave man, however, who undertakes what the people declare is impossible, and if prices under skillful management are advanced from the present high level during the remainder of the month and during October, something in the way of a record will have been established. It is therefore up to Mr. Patten to make good. But that this is a favorable season for such an undertaking is beyond all question. The reasons have been so often set out and are so well known both to the trade and to the public, that a repetition here seems quite unnecessary. At the advance the feeling is still very bullish and there is a confident belief that barring temporary reactions, the level of prices will be further advanced the coming week.

Wheat: Wheat yielded to the pressure of large northwestern receipts after a sharp advance in the first half of the week. The advance was wholly due to the Armour interests which forced short covering and fearing heavy shipments from Duluth to Chicago tomorrow the manipulators backed away. The exceedingly high premium for No. 2 red winter wheat was helpful to the upward movement. The demand for this quality of wheat arises from the enforcement of the rule of the agricultural department that bleached flour be stamped as such. Millers have therefore been forced to pay fancy prices for the red variety. Considerable buying of winter wheat millers has developed in the cash market of Minneapolis. The situation continues strong, and does not indicate a serious price break. In the long run the large Canadian crop and our big shipping wheat production will have its effect in creating a lower market, but immediate trading should be confined to selling on all advances and in taking small profits.

The Gas Meter

The gas meter has been the subject of joke and anathema so long that it is hard to make the truth about it known. As a matter of fact it is one of the most accurate mechanical measuring devices in common use, and it positively cannot register gas consumption unless gas is passing through it.

It is true that a gas meter MAY become deranged and run fast or slow, but statistics prove that the average error is about the same as between the fast and slow apparatus. The great majority of meters are correct within the limits allowed by law—2 per cent fast or 2 per cent slow.

The grocer maintains one or two scales by which he weighs all products sold by weight. The gas company maintains an individual meter for every consumer, carefully checks the device before it is installed, inspects it to see that it is in good order and repairs it free if imperfections are discovered.

The chief principles of the gas meter have been in use since 1844. Hundreds of inventors have tried to improve upon them and have failed. If it were possible for the gas company to obtain meters absolutely accurate under all conditions, we would be the first to put in an order for a supply.

We contend that if a consumer reads and checks his meter frequently he will be able to analyze the increases or decreases in his bills and account for the differences by the more or less gas he uses.

Miss Bogue's French Leave

There is something about the personality of Miss Vergilia Bogue, the Portola queen, which seems to make her the center of an episode wherever she moves. Boasting no intimate understanding of the feminine mind, I shrink from the attempt to analyze the characteristics which constitute Miss Bogue the heroine of continuous adventure. I merely chronicle the fact that she is, as it were, a steel from which sparks of excitement are perpetually struck. Where other girls enter to illustrate the commonplace, she is the center of incident. There is a story wherever she moves; there is a never-ending something—romance or I know not what—in her every day life no less than in her book. That is why Miss

MRS. BALDWIN WOOD

One of the most charming and talented of the participants in the vaudeville entertainment for the benefit of the Free Room for the Blind.

Bogue is on everybody's tongue; the usual is out of her sphere. Certainly there was nothing extraordinary about a certain meeting of the clever women who planned and so successfully carried through the tag day for Father Crowley and the Youth's Directory; yet when Miss Bogue joined the group at the St. Francis, the atmosphere seemed charged with mysterious excitement. Miss Bogue came with the French chaperon who sometime accompanies her about town and for a while entered with enthusiasm into the dry business details of the meeting. Presently, however, she showed signs of fatigue and turning to her dame de garde, announced rather loudly and in French that she was bored with the affair. "Do not bother with these tedious details," answered the chaperon in her native tongue; "let us go somewhere else." French is not an unknown language at best and it happened that half a dozen of the ladies of the tag day committee spoke it excellently. So one after the other, with scrupulous politeness of tone and word, half a dozen of them turned to Miss Bogue and speaking in French, assured her that she was at liberty to withdraw. Miss Bogue and her dame de garde withdrew.

Her Singular Fund of Knowledge

At one of our aristocratic women's clubs where the intellects of the members are sharpened by discussion of abstract questions, sociological and literary, it was suggested the other day that apropos of the rumor that the junior Willie K. Vanderbilts are to be put asunder by judicial process it might prove interesting to debate the question "Is the divorce germ hereditary?" This brilliant suggestion was made by a very young matron who prides herself on her Colonial ancestry and the broad scope of her knowledge of literature. She was quite enthusiastic over her novel idea. She reminded the ladies present that young Mrs. Vanderbilt's parents, the James G. Fairs, were divorced and likewise the parents of Willie K. Vanderbilt Jr. Her recollections of family history were remarkable for one so young. She knew that the Charley Fairs were always on the point of getting a divorce; that Tessie Fair was a most uphappy wife and that she was separated from Herman Oelrichs; that one of Willie K. Vanderbilt's aunts was divorced; that his sister, the Duchess of Marlborough who has been separated from her husband, has refrained from suing for a divorce only because of the earnest pleadings of her mother, who is now Mrs. "Ollie" Belmont, and who is actuated by concern for the social prestige which she derives from being the mother-in-law of a duke. Incidentally she disclosed her familiarity with the scandal attending the divorce of the senior Willie K. Vanderbilts, and when she finished she suddenly realized that the circumambient air was somewhat congealed. Frowning upon her from the edge of the groupe was one distinguished lady who has been twice divorced, another whose parents were divorced and another whose daughter was but recently divorced. "My," said the lady who herself has had experience of the divorce court, "one would think that your principal occupation was the gathering of scandalous gossip."

Art Comes High

Once more the Francis J. Carolans have discovered that the external evidences of culture come high, and once more a broad grin garnishes the countenance of Burlingame. The Carolans have had a dispute with Miss Elsie de Wolfe, a talented young woman with a keen sense of the artistic who is skilled in house decoration, something of a wizard in fact, for in the home of a vulgar millionaire she can successfully neutralize the effect of his personality on his environment. In the home of the Carolans she contrived an atmosphere that fairly reeked of culture, but when it came to paying the price there arose a difference of opinion that crystallized in a law suit. Fortunately the case will not come to trial. It has been settled out of court. Some years ago Mrs. Carolan developed an appetite for literature, and a persuasive eloquent book-agent happened along about that time with a whole library of editions de luxe. Catching Mrs. Carolan in the mood he had no difficulty in getting her signature to a contract, but collecting the bill was another matter. Of course the bill was settled. The book-agent was quite willing to compromise and so too was Mrs. Carolan.

He Caught Her Carnations

For more than a week now the tea tables have been aflutter over a little incident which happened when Mr. and Mrs. William E. Dean left with their daughter Helen for Boston. The Deans departed on Thursday, September 23. Philip Baker crossed the bay with the party and was particularly engrossed in taking his farewell of Miss Dean. In parting Miss Dean tossed him some of the carnations she was wearing and the young chap caught them with an alacrity and a look of intense appreciation that seemed to tell the old old story to onlookers. So friends are wondering whether the expected is going to be announced.

The "Orchid Lady" Coming

Beryl Whitney who, since the uphappy termination of her romantic marriage, has dropped the name of Graydon and prefers now to be called simply Mrs. Whitney, is coming to this city very soon with her parents. They will take apartments at the Fairmont and will stay through the winter season. Mrs. Beryl Whitney, during her recent stay in Paris, acquired the name of the "orchid lady" on account of her fondness for these expensive blooms. Her apartments, I am told by friends who visited her in the capital of the world, were massed everywhere with the rarests specimens. The former Mrs. Graydon is now with her parents at The Camp, as the Whitney summer place in Maine is called. They will come from Maine to California and we may soon expect to see the lobby of the hotel on the hill gleam with the splendor of Beryl Whitney's gowns, for she is a stunning dresser. Which reminds me that her sister-in-law, Mrs. Vincent Whitney caused something more than a stir recently by her startling red costume with Dutch neck and her huge hat to match. Those who saw her at the St. Francis and later at the Town and Country Club tea looked twice or thrice before they were prepared to comment.

Is Miss Crocker Engaged?

Rumor has been over busy during the last few days joining the names of Miss Jennie Crocker and Dr. Tracy Russell of San Mateo. Is there an engagement there? is the question which interests Miss Crocker's friends more than any other topic at the present time, but there are no indications that curiosity is to be satisfied with an announcement. A certain innocent, unsophisticated and exceedingly courageous young lady of the newspaper profession is fully convinced on this point after a recent experience. This young lady was told to investigate the rumor of the engagement and with anticipations of a "scoop," she set forth to find Miss Crocker. But Miss Crocker does not like to be interviewed by newspaper writers and the young lady reporter was unsuccessful in all her attempts to meet her. Instead she was forced to confide her errand to a certain haughty unapproachable who immediately raised the temperature of the interview to boiling point and kept it there for a few sizzling minutes, after which the wilted young lady reporter went away, fully convinced that there was nothing in the rumor. Miss Crocker's friends, however, attach more importance to it.

Heiress Going to London

Miss Crocker will soon leave for London to be the guest of Ambassador and Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, the Honorable and Mrs. John Warde, and Lord and Lady Granard. Speculation may now busy itself with the problem of how much nearer this visit will bring San Francisco society to British royalty. Mrs. Reid is the only woman from this part of the country whose charms of personality, added to the favors of fortune, gave her immediate admission to the most exclusive of London homes which really means the king's set. Lord Granard, of course, is very close to the throne, holding a post in the royal household, while his wife who was one of the Mills girls, has had no difficulty in making herself a personage among personages; her chic ways and busy brains have rendered her extremely popular. The Honorable John Warde, whose wife is a daughter of the Reids, is also part of this grandiose set; so we need not be surprised at any triumphs on the part of Miss Crocker which the cable may report.

No Hope for Heiress Hunters

Titled but impecunious heiress hunters who, during the past twelvemonth, have found the American preserves so exceedingly profitable, need not rejoice at the approaching visit of Miss Crocker, notwithstanding the fact that she is the wealthiest and most desirable heiress in California. Miss Crocker is not of those who pine to rehabilitate a ruined ancestral estate and she will not be tempted into an alliance which involves that process by the most brilliant title that goes back to Norman William. Miss Crocker is a thoroughgoing little American and she has the American faculty of seeing through sham, even a titled sham lacking the power to dazzle her keen eyes. No such mess as the Gould-Castellane-De-Sagan affair will ever play havoc with the Crocker millions. It is true that some of Miss Crocker's relatives have married into Debrett, but there have been no hints of mercenary intent to mar the romance of these particular unions. If anything Miss Crocker is hypersensitive on the subject of her wealth, having cultivated, by observation of others, a horror of being wooed for her money which is saved from monomania only by her exquisite poise and abiding good sense. The heiress hunter of London who hopes to mend a shattered fortune with the assistance of Miss Crocker is dwelling in a fool's paradise.

The Portola Luncheon

There was some grumbling over the menu of the Portola luncheon given at the California Club last Tuesday, due of course to the impossibility of acquiring an immediate taste for tortillas and chili con carne, but otherwise the affair was acclaimed an exquisite success. In its little details it was as artistically perfect as could be. The decorations were Spanish—flaming poppies, gay sunflowers, goldenrod and roses. All of the three hundred women present were garbed in the finery beloved of Castilian beauties. From unsuspected chests came the filmiest of lace mantillas, quaint old jewelry and other treasures reminiscent of the glad fine days before the gringo came. There was Mrs. Lovell White, and a handsomer grande dame never queened it over the aristocrats of Alta California, stately and erect, her eyes melting with merriment. Over her abundant snowy hair Mrs. White wore a lace shawl and red roses glowed against her black velvet gown.. Her long pendant ear rings of gold filigree were made in the long ago. And Mrs. White made a pretty little talk which charmed everybody. On one side of Mrs. White, at the head of the row of tables, sat Miss Vergilia Bogue, looking very much the queen of the fiesta. Mrs. Edward L. Baldwin, the president of the club, was so warmly applauded when she announced that the debt on the club house had been cleared that the members present were swept away with enthusiasm and subscribed a tidy sum toward the Portola fiesta. The program between courses was clever, Spanish music, dances and a burlesque on Don Gaspar de Portola, written by Mrs. Baldwin, set to music by Madame Caro Roma and sung by the best vocalists in the club.

She Knew Them by Sight

It was at a luncheon given, not long since, by a very prominent and wealthy lady to several members of the Burlingame Club and others of the ultra smart set. A well known matron whose husband is a millionaire several times over, surprised several of the ladies present by addressing them very distinctly by their names. As they had met this matron but once before, her accurate memory was commented on rather generally until one of the guests who is not a little proud of her family tree, disposed of the matter thus: "No doubt she knows some of us by sight very well. Surely in years gone by we have been pointed out to her on the street or at the theatre."

The Winter's Brilliant Promise

Most of the big events of the winter have been arranged for, now that both Mr. Greenway and Mrs. Alexander have announced the dates of their dances. Mr. Greenway who enters upon his thirtieth year in the management of the assemblies, will give four dances, the first on Saturday, November 19, the second during holiday week, another in January and the last just before Lent. Mrs. Alexander who will continue to manage the colonial series, plans to give but two balls, these to be at the Hotel St. Francis. The first is for Wednesday, December 1, and the second on Tuesday, February 8. Mrs. Alexander succeeded last winter in giving the prettiest balls of the year, excepting of course, the celebrated American Beauty ball of the Henry T. Scotts. The splendor of that function outdazzled all others. Besides these six big balls, there are to be several others for which arrangements are now under way. There will be a large ball at the Palace. It is said that Senator and Mrs. Francis Newlands who always entertain with true Western lavishness, will outdo their previous efforts this winter upon the completion of the new hotel. Then besides this, there are the concerts of the St. Francis Musical Art Society. During the brief time of last winter's experiment—for high class musical ventures are always an experiment as a social diversion—these charming affairs came to be considered in the same class as the big balls and other superior society functions. Shopping the other afternoon, I met a well known matron and her bud daughter, both equipping their wardrobes with gowns exclusively for use at these concerts.

Parisian Gowns at the Fairmont

Curious folk who wonder what becomes of the model gowns sent to this city from the houses of Worth, Callot, Paquin and others might have satisfied their curiosity had they been at the Fairmont last Saturday afternoon when Mrs. J. C. Meyerstein's guests entered Laurel Court, following the afternoon's matching of brains at the whist tables. There were probably eighty women in the party, all of them gowned in the new autumn modes, and a prettier group has not been assembled this fall. There was Mrs. Noble Eaton, blonde and peachy, looking as pretty as could be in one of those lacy gowns made of baby and "adult" Irish lace mixed, fashioned in a loose princess style, and a yellowish hat with swirling paradise plumes. Mrs. John Baker Jr., who is making her home at the Fairmont since her return from Europe, wore a gown of an odd greenish-blue satin made in the new draped style, with the tunic of jet beads draping the satin. Mrs. Frank Ames who is tall enough to carry the new draped effects, wore a gown that breathed of Paris. It was of peacock blue with an overdress of steel beads. One of the most picturesque gowns was worn by Mrs. John Martin. It was gold cloth embroidered with a silk of a darker shade. The hat was a big round affair with plumes shading from orange to pale yellow.

Mrs. Alexander to the Front

That the Colonial dances will be continued this winter has been decided after much speculation as to what would be the ultimate fate of these exclusive affairs which were begun with so much eclat last season. While the dances were a success from an artistic point of view and from the fact that they were thoroughly enjoyed by the younger set, there was constant friction from the start, and the evident desire on the part of the director to rival Greenway in the matter of social precedence was the cause of much annoyance to many of the patronesses who were personally in sympathy with the Czar, and who resented being the "rungs of ambition's ladder." The dances are to continue this season but without the moral support of the twenty-five patronesses who lent the prestige of their name to the affairs last season. Mrs. Alexander is to organize them on her own personal responsibility altogether as a business proposition over which as much social glamor as possible will be thrown. The dates set are December 1 and February 8, the last of which will be a Mardi Gras ball as was the one last year which ended so spectacularly with the loss of Jennie Crocker's pearls. That the personal rivalry between Mrs. Alexander and Greenway will be keener than ever this winter is predicted by all who know the fighting qualities of both.

The Wallace Petition

It was a shock to the friends of Mrs. William T. Wallace, wife of the late jurist, to hear that her sons, Ryland and Richard Wallace, had applied for letters of guardianship over their mother, on account of her old age and feebleness. Mrs. Wallace was formerly Romietta Burnett, daughter of the first governor of California, Peter H. Burnett, and a sister of John M. Burnett, the attorney, and of Mrs. C. T. Ryland of San Jose. Besides two sons there are two daughters, Mrs. Richard H. Sprague, (Isabel Wallace), whose first husband was James Mervyn Donahue, brother of Baroness von Schroeder, and Mrs. John F. Sheehan, (Addie Wallace), who has made her home with her parents for several years since her divorce. She has three children. Richard Wallace married several years ago but the match proved unhappy. Ryland Wallace married Miss Annie Bradley, daughter of the late George L. Bradley by whom he has one son, Bradley Wallace, now a student at Harvard. Mr. and Mrs. Ryland Wallace are separated. Mrs. Ryland Wallace is very wealthy in her own right and spends most of her time abroad but she will return to San Francisco this winter. She is still a pretty and interesting woman and is devoted to her only son. Her handsome home in Clay street has been rented for two or three years to C. N. Black of the United Railroads. Judge Wallace left property valued at about $200,000. The sudden deaths of Judge Wallace's two daughters, Miss Marguerite and Miss Romie Wallace, within a couple of years of each other, was a sad blow to the family. William T. Wallace Jr. died many years ago from hasty consumption.

Oakland Junior Assemblies

Invitations for the Junior Assemblies, the smartest functions of Oakland's exclusive set, have just been issued. The dates of the dances are October 29, November 26, December 29, January 28 and April 10, at Maple Hall. The patronesses are Mrs. William High (to whom acceptances must be sent), Mrs. N. A. Acker, Mrs. Frank Adams, Mrs. C. W. Armes Jr., Mrs. Samuel Breck, Mrs. Arthur Crellin, Mrs. L. L. Cockroff, Mrs. Prentiss Selby, Mrs. W. E. Sharon, Mrs. Edgar Stone, Mrs. J. R. Scupham and Mrs. Charles Wetmore.

Fete For Fabiola Hospital

An event of note will be the charity fete for the Fabiola Hospital which will take place at Ye Liberty Playhouse on Thursday, November 4. Society on both sides of the bay is deeply interested. On this occasion an operetta will be produced with a flower chorus in which many of the most prominent and attractive young society girls of Oakland's smart set will take part. Elaborate preparations are now being made and rehearsals are taking place.

Miss Ruth Kales Engaged

An engagement recently announced which caused a great deal of surprise both here and in Oakland was that of Miss Ruth Kales, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Martin W. Kales of Oakland, and Thomas Knowles. The news was told at a tea given at the handsome Kales home in the Lakeside district of Oakland during the week. The prospective groom is the son of Josiah Knowles, and comes from one of the pioneer families of the State. Both families belong to the exclusive set across the bay. No date has been as yet set for the wedding.

Ensign Theobald to Wed

A wedding of interest to California friends will take place today at New Castle, New Hampshire, when Miss Helen Reeves Berry, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. John James Berry, will become the bride of Ensign Robert Alfred Theobald, attached to the U. S. S. Winconsin. Mr. Theobald is a California boy and a noted athelete. He belongs to a well known family here, being the only son of Mr. and Mrs. George Theobald. The bride belongs to a well known New Hampshire family and is a brilliant linguist. The young couple will probably visit this city in the winter and will be entertained by a host of friends.

Chamber Music Concert

The next chamber music concert of the California Conservatory will take place Friday evening of next week. These concerts are exciting much enthusiasm among music lovers. In the California Conservatory are associated some of the best artists that ever consecrated their talents to the heavenly maid in this city, and they are deserving of appreciation and encouragement. The program for their next concert is as follows: Trio for Piano, Clarinetto and Viola, E flat, (Mozart), Hermann Genss, Giannini, Giulio Minetti; Concerto for Violin and Cello, (Bach), Giulio Minetti, Arthur Weiss; Fantaiestucke for Clarinetto and Piano, opp. 73, (Schumann), Giannini, Hermann Genss; Trio for Piano, Violin and Cello, op, 15, (Smetana), Hermann Genss, Giulio Minetti, Arthur Weiss.

Miss Weston's Brilliant Debut

Miss Carrie Goebel Weston took her place among the most brilliant of our young violinists when she made her debut last week at the musicale and hop given in Commandery Hall for the benefit of the new school of Star of the Sea parish. Miss Weston graduated last June in Notre Dame College, San Jose, and is now embarked on a musical career which promises to be unusually successful. Miss Weston rendered Wieniawski's Faust Fantasie, showing a vigor of tone and a masculinity of bowing remarkable at her years and a command of technical intricacies worthy of an experienced virtuoso. She chose a most difficult composition for her debut and it reflects credit not only upon her talent but also upon the teaching of the Notre Dame conservatory that she acquitted herself so well. Miss Weston will give a public recital in the beginning of the year to enable her to perfect her studies in Germany and her appearance will be eagerly awaited by music lovers.

Beringer Musical Club Concert

The Beringer Musical Club, under the direction of Professor and Madame Joseph Beringer, gave its twelfth piano and vocal recital at Century Hall last week, entertaining a very large audience. A well selected and varied program was offered and the excellent work of the performers elicited considerable applause. Compositions for both instrument and voice were chosen from a variety of composers including Schubert, d'Albert, Saint-Saens, Chopin and Lizst. Those who took part in the program were Miss Zdenka Buben, Miss Irene De Martin, Miss Estella McNeil, Miss Sadie Bultman, Miss Anita Morse, Miss Frances Westington, Miss Alta Yocom, Mr. Melton Mowbray and Mr. Harry Bultman.

Vaudeville for the Youths' Directory

The vaudeville entertainment for the benefit of the Youths' Directory which will take place tonight in the colonial ball room of the St. Francis will be an affair of more than usual artistic excellence. Among those who will take part in the varied program are A. Roncovieri, Miss Ellie Ewing in a reading, Mrs. L. Leon, Mrs. Mabel Tourny White, Miss Cecil Cowles, Miss Helen Grey, Reginald Travers and Miss May Sullivan in "A Pair of Lunatics," Miss Gertrude Proll, "Billy" Hynes and Miss Nevada Hefron. Artists from all the leading dalies have contributed posters which will be auctioned. The hotel has donated everything needed for the performance and the new stage curtain will be seen for the first time. Mrs. Margaret C. May has been particularly active in making the preparations for the benefit. Among the patronesses are Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Mrs. Edward Robeson Taylor, Mrs. Richard Tobin, Mrs. Alexander Loughborough, Mrs. J. C. Meyerstein, Mrs. John Baker Jr., Mrs. L. V. Merle, Mrs. A. W. Scott, Mrs. James McNab, Mrs. Prentice Cobb Hale, Mrs. Charles J. Heggerty, Mrs. Julius Kahn, and many others. Martin V. Merle, the young playwright, who intended to leave for New York, has postponed his departure in order to help in the staging of the entertainment.

In the Social Spotlight

There was an interesting conference on good roads at the Montara Inn, Montara, last Saturday. Harr Wagner presided and C. B. Smith acted as secretary. Speeches were made by Supervisor Casey, J. B. Rogers, chief engineer of the Ocean Shore, J. F. Weinke, William S. Barnes and M. B. Johnson.

Mrs. Edward G. Schmeidell and Mrs. Seward Bailey McNear will be the hostesses at a large "buffet bridge" party on Thursday, October 7, at the Lagunitas Club in Ross Valley.

Lawrence W. Harris and his bride, formerly Lucy King, will return this week from their honeymoon and occupy their flat at Washington and Devisadero streets.

Mrs. Francis Carolan, who was in town at the St. Francis for several days last week, entertained a number of friends at a very pretty informal luncheon Tuesday afternoon.

Miss Ruth Sadler was hostess at bridge last Wednesday afternoon at the St. Francis. She was assisted in receiving her guests by her sister, Mrs. Lewis Risdon Meade. Among those present were Miss Talbot, Mrs. Carl Schilling, Misses Mills, Mrs. Harold Law, Miss Wilson, Miss Marian Lally, Miss Elizabeth Stetson, Mrs. Alexander de Bretville, Miss Helen Grey, Mrs. Chas. Plum, Miss Mabel Gregory and Mrs. Walter Scott.

The "Service Set" of the Fairmont has been rejoicing in the presence of three admirals during the past week. Admiral R. C. Halliday who has been in the Orient inspecting the various naval stations returned on the Mongolia and is at the Fairmont. He is accompanied by Mrs. Holliday. Rear Admiral W. C. Wise and Mrs. Wise arrived at the Fairmont from the East and Read Admiral T. F. Jewell and Mrs. Jewell came up from Del Monte where they have been spending the summer. The Jewells are rejoicing at a visit of their son, Commander C. T. Jewell, who is out on leave. Other additions to the "Service Set" are I. J. Brice, U. S. N., Leo. D. Marier and wife, U. S. N., F. T. Chambers, U. S. N., and A. G. Berry, U. S. N.

The arrival of the great liners from across the Pacific always brings a number of delightful people to the Fairmont, whose coming is usually the signal for a series of entertainments during their visit. Among those who arrived on the Mongolia were the A. F. Judds of Honolulu, who are accompanied by Mrs. A. H. Judd and Robbins B. Anderson, Honolulu. Another passenger of note was Mrs. P. Ritter, wife of the Swiss consul, who arrived from Tokio. With Mrs. Ritter are Miss L. Ritter and Master Ritter.

Mrs. Mary Thompson Deedy who has been residing in New York for the past six years has returned to the city and is visiting her sister, Mrs. Sutcliff. Mrs. Deedy is a member of a prominent Southern family here.

Mr. and Mrs. Pierre Moore (Edna Davis) who have been residing in Belvedere since their marriage will come to town for the winter.

Charles Templeton Crocker was host at a dinner Saturday evening in the Hotel St. Francis, his guests being Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Eastland, Miss Virginia Jolliffe and Miss Jennie Crocker. The party later enjoyed several hours at the theatre.

Mrs. A. H.-R. Schmidt and her son Herbert will leave in the near future for New York, sailing immediately for Paris, where they will spend the next few months.

W. A. Clark is up from Los Angeles and stopping at the St. Francis.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 18,665.

WILLIAM C. ESPY, sometimes known as W. C. ESPY, and MARY CATHERINE ESPY, his wife, Plaintiffs,

vs.

All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California, to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of WILLIAM C. ESPY, sometimes known as W. C. ESPY, and MARY CATHERINE ESPY, his wife, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and county, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, bounded and more particularly described as follows:

Parcel No. 1. Commencing at a point on the Northerly line of "A" Street, distant thereon eighty-two (82) feet six (6) inches Westerly from the Westerly line of Tenth Avenue; running thence Westerly along the said Northerly line of "A" Street twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Northerly one hundred (100) feet; thence at right angles Easterly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles Southerly one hundred (100) feet to the Northerly line of "A" Street and the point of commencement. Being a portion of Outside Lands Block number Two Hundred and Seventy-four (274).

Parcel No. 2. Commencing at a point on the Easterly line of Third Avenue, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet Southerly from the Southerly line of Clement Street; running thence Southerly along said Easterly line of Third Avenue twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Easterly one hundred and twenty (120) feet; thence at right angles Northerly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles Westerly one hundred and twenty (120) feet to the Easterly line of Third Avenue and the point of commencement. Being a portion of Outside Lands Block number One Hundred and Eighty-three (183).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That the above entitled Court make and enter its decree:

1st.—Ascertaining and determining all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description.

2nd.—Establishing and determining the title of plaintiff to said property and that plaintiff be adjudged and decreed to be the owner in fee simple absolute of all of said property.

3rd.—For such other and further relief as to the Court may seem just.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 25th day of September, 1909.

(Seal) H. I. Mulcrevy, Clerk.
By M. P. Bruton, Deputy Clerk.

The first publication of this summons was made in "Town Talk" newspaper on the 2nd day of October, A. D. 1909.

Stage

Corinne in "Mlle. Mischief"

When Sydney Rosenfeld translated and adapted "Mlle. Mischief" for the benefit of the American stage, he paid an unnecessarily extravagant compliment to foreign genius. Were it not that the superiority of the light music of the continent of Europe has become more of a superstition than ever since the tremendous vogue of "The Merry Widow," I do not think that Rosenfeld would have assumed the fatigue of adaptation where original composition would have been just as easy and certainly more satisfactory. This is not to say that this Viennese operetta in which the delightful and perennial Corinne returns to us is unworthy or disappointing; it is simply to question the wisdom and patriotism, if you will, of seeking inspiration for our light opera in the scores and books of foreigners when there are so many Americans who can do just as well. It would be interesting to calculate just how many ambitious youths are at this present moment marching upon New York, with their hearts thumping heavily against the typewritten pages of operettas as good, if not better, than "Mlle. Mischief." Occasionally one arrives, not in New York merely, but in the innermost office of a Broadway manager, and we pluck up a little more courage anent the future of American music. But meanwhile the continent of Europe, to the inflamed managerial eye, swarms with undiscovered Lehars and in the tumultuous search for another masterpiece, "Mlle. Mischief" and other works that are certainly not masterpieces, are brought home and acclimated. It is as light as a sunmote, as inconsequential as froth, as illogical as a woman's reason, but withal bright, laughable and alluring. Its plot which moves from an artist's studio to an Austrian barracks with the ease of an aeroplane, suggests farce comedy more than comic opera, for it is altogether too tenuous to bind the three acts into anything like coherence. But the laughs are scattered with profusion, the lines, never bad, sometimes scintillate unexpectedly and taken all in all, the operetta, with the reservations which I have made in favor of native workmanship, deserves considerable praise. If it were more completely the work of Sydney Rosenfeld, I am almost certain it would be a better book and I have no doubt that the music too would have lost nothing of piquancy and lilt by having been also a matter of home industry. For Corinne who is no stranger to the theatre-lovers of this city, there are no words but those of compliment. The smile plays just as fetchingly as ever over her gleaming teeth and her snapping eyes; her patter is as saucily delivered; her dancing step has lost none of its light grace; and I think she has banted. She makes the most of the songs which are allotted to her, a generous and satisfying number; and her rosy personality dominates the stage in a manner an older and more experienced star might envy. The stage pictures in "Mlle. Mischief" are very pretty; the dancing girls foot it with unusual agility and skill; and the whole company is one about which it would be ungracious to utter complaint.

Billie Burke at the Van Ness

Billie Burke comes to the Van Ness Theatre on Monday evening in "Love Watches." Miss Burke is now making her first transcontinental tour as a star. She was nearly that when she came here with John Drew in "My Wife." Miss Burke owes her rapid rise in her profession to the power of an unusually charming personality. She has histrionic ability, too, but it is her charm that in two brief seasons has won her a popularity that others have worked a lifetime to acquire. "Love Watches" is said to be just the play to exhibit this pleasant quality in full force. Written by two French playwrights. Mm. de Flers and de Caillavet, and adapted by Miss Gladys Unger, a California girl, the plays tells a pretty story of an impulsive, wayward little French maid who loves a young man, tells him so and marries him. Then, learning that he has been a flirt in his recent bachelor days, her jealousy is aroused and she threatens that if he flirts again she will follow his example. How she tries to make good her threat, when she thinks her husband has deceived her, and how she fails in her attempt and rushes back to her husband's arms, more in love with him than ever, is all told in a delightful way. Miss Burke's company includes Vernon Steel, Ernest Lawford, Maude Odell, Kate Meek, Muriel Ashwynne and Stanley Dark. She will stay two weeks at the Van Ness, giving matinees Wednesdays and Saturdays.

Cohan Show at Garrick

A brass-band, an organized baseball club and a fully equipped fire department are some of the features that go to make up the Geo. M. Cohan rural musical success, "Fifty Miles from Boston" that starts its week's engagement at the Garrick Sunday afternoon. The usual midweek matinees on Thursday and Saturday will be given. Cohan's latest abounds in laughable episodes, sparkling dialogue, fascinating ensembles and charming song numbers of the true Cohan kind. The story deals with the robbery of a postoffice at Brookfield, the fastening of the blame upon the brother of the postmistress to force her into a marriage, the return of the baseball hero after winning an intercollegiate game for Harvard and village politics. The song hits include such well-known numbers as "My Small Town Gal," "Harrigan,"

GRACE KING

"Aint it Awful," "Jack and Jill" and "Boys Who Fight the Flames." The company is under Cohan management and is most competent. The benefit committee of the Hebrew Orphan Asylum have selected the Monday night performance of "Fifty Miles from Boston" as their benefit, and this worthy cause is expected to profit greatly by the result.

More of "Sweet Kitty"

"Sweet Kitty Bellairs" will be started on its second and last week in the Alcazar next Monday evening. That it would exceed the customary seven days' run was assured by the success of its initial presentation, for everyone who then witnessed it went forth to announce that it eclipsed its production last season in both acting and staging. In theatricals as in everything else nothing succeeds like success, and the best advertisers of "Sweet Kitty Bellairs" are the folk who have seen it, for they are advising their friends to embrace the opportunity it affords to enjoy a dramatic treat such as is seldom offered. That is how the Alcazar came to be filled to capacity at every performance of the David Belasco play since last Monday evening and why no cessation of the clamor for admittance is yet in sight. White the wonderfully effective work of Evelyn Vaughan in the title role is more largely responsible than anything else for the success of "Sweet Kitty Bellairs" the acting of the other principal people, the elaborate scenic effects, the beautiful costumes and the cleverly-drawn situations and bright lines of the play itself are no less important factors. No such lavishness in pecuniary outlay has ever been attempted by any other stock theatre management anywhere as Belasco and Mayer have invested in the production of this dramatic gem; seldom has San Francisco been visited by a "road show" presenting such perfection of histrionic and pictorial detail as is shown in the Alcazar's presentation of "Sweet Kitty."

Big Bill for the Orpheum

The Orpheum announces for next week a bill of acts that have been headliners wherever they have appeared. James Young, assisted by Lorayne Osborne and Robert Strauss, will present a one act college play called "When Love is Young," which is said to be a condensed version of Rita Johnson Young's comedy "Brown of Harvard." Some years ago Mr. Young was the youngest Shakespearean actor in this country, and of late he has been the principal male support of Viola Allen and other distinguished exponents of the classic drama. Miss Mary Norman will introduce her clever monologue, "Some Types of Woman." It presents incidents from the lives of several prominent actresses behind the scenes. The Boston school teacher and the society buds of New York, Chicago and San Francisco are cleverly, amusingly and faithfully caricatured by Miss Norman. Ed. F. Reynard, who is styled "The Ventriloquist with a production," will perform an entire play with the assistance of his automatons. Pilu is also on the bill. Pilu is the quaint name of an extraordinary dog brought to this country by Signor D. Ancillotti, a famous European animal trainer. Pilu will give his so-called demonstration of mind reading. While Ancillotti is in the auditorium receiving questions from those about him, this remarkable canine answers from the stage without any perceptible exchange of code or signal from his master. The Big City Quartette, the Myosotis Sisters, Henry Clive, and that inimitable comedienne and character actress, Edna Aug, will conclude their engagements with next week. A series of novel motion pictures will be the finale.

Return of the Philippine Band

It will be welcome news to all music-lovers that the Philippine Constabulary Band, which was received with such enthusiasm last February, will give four more concerts in the Dreamland Rink before sailing for Manila next Tuesday. Since playing at the Taft inauguration they have had great success in the principal cities of the east. The conductor, Captain Walter Howard Loving, is regarded as one of the great teachers and leaders of the country. The band will give concerts in the Dreamland Rink on Sunday, October 3, and Monday, October 4, at 3:30 and 8:15. For the Monday matinee, at which popular prices will prevail, the first part of the program will be given by the organization as a brass band and the second part by the same players acting as a symphony orchestra. Among the orchestral numbers that will be performed are Delibes' intermezzo "Naila" and Greig's "Peer Gynt Suite."

Louis Mann Comedy at Ye Liberty

Next week the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will offer one of the best rural comedies the stage has ever known in "All on Account of Eliza," the farcical play in which Louis Mann and his talented wife, Clara Lipman, starred for several seasons. It was written by Leo Dietrichstein, who gave us "Are You a Mason?", "Before and After" and several other successes. The scenes of the comedy are laid in a small New England town, it is peopled with character types and is filled with clean, wholesome, typical American humor. George Friend assumes the principal comedy role, an old German, the part played by Louis Mann, and Sydney Ayres will be congenially cast as his son, whose love affair with a pretty little school teacher from New York City forms the plot of the play. Although the piece is written mainly for laughing purposes, the love interest is delightfully interwoven and is strong enough to hold the interest till its happy conclusion. In addition to Mr. Ayres and Mr. Friend, Henry Shumer, Robert Harrison, George Webster, William Wolbert, Robert Lawler, May Clement, Laura Hudson, Edith Lyle, Mrs. Mina Gleason and the other Liberty favorites will assist in the fun making. After "All on Account of Eliza," the Bishop Players will give the first Oakland presentation of "The Halfbreed," a Western drama by Harry D. Cottrell and Oliver Morosco which has met with popular favor in all the stock houses throughout the country.

Distinguished Actor at Orpheum

James Young, who will be seen in a sketch at the Orpheum next week, is not only an interesting stage personality, but engages attention on account of his distinguished family connections. A native of Baltimore, his father is a State Senator of Maryland and one of the pillars of the old-school democracy the claims of which he supports as the editor and publisher of the Baltimore Telegram. This paper by the way was established by the great-grandfather of the vaudeville star. Young has supported Viola Allen, Richard Mansfield and other great actors and is considered a fine interpreter of Shakespearean character. He is the husband of Rida Johnson Young who wrote "Brown of Harvard," "The Boys of Company B" and the new comedy, "The Lottery."

Great Hit at Valencia

Corinne, with the New York production of "Mlle. Mischief," has made a great hit and large audiences are in evidence at the Valencia Theatre. The Shuberts have surrounded Corinne with a company of high capacity and the chorus is a capable gathering of singers and dancers, the girls being particularly good-looking and of good voices. The singing of the ensemble numbers shows splendid management and the production is a lavish one. There will be performances of "Mlle. Mischief" this Saturday afternoon and evening and all next week, including the Wednesday matinee, when there is a slight reduction in prices. On Sunday evening, October 11, George Fawcett will appear at the Valencia Theatre in "The Great John Ganton."

A New Tully Play

During Portola week Manager Harry W. Bishop will give the initial production at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, of a new play by Richard Walton Tully entitled "Cupid, the Cow-Punch." Tully is the California dramatist who gained considerable renown through "The Rose of the Rancho," in which he collaborated with David Belasco after it had been successfully produced at Ye Liberty in Oakland and the Majestic Theatre in this city under the title of "Juanita of San Juan"; and also through his college farce, "A Strenuous Life." His new play is based upon the novel of the same name by Eleanor Gates, his wife, which ran as a serial through the Saturday Evening Post and afterwards appeared in book form. "Cupid, the Cow-Punch" is essentially a Western play, but one entirely different from any previously seen, and its appearance will be awaited with interest by playgoers of both sides of the bay.

DOWN THE CHUTES.

More Fun at the Chutes

New acrobatic acts, promenade concerts, novel fun devices, the popular free theatre with a complete change of program and many other features to be seen for the first time by patrons will constitute Sunday's offering at the New Chutes. The open-air entertainment will be headed by the Arnold troupe of Australian gymnasts and the De Valle trio of acrobats. They will perform afternoon and evening from the bandstand during the concert intermissions. One of the latest fads with Chutes patrons is the "North Pole Expedition." Hundreds have taken the trip during the past week and new features have been introduced on the ice-field route for the benefit of Sunday explorers. The latest songs of the day done into concerted arrangements will be the feature of the California State Band concerts. Four of the soloists will be heard afternoon and evening.

In the Limelight

There will be Wednesday and Saturday matinees during the Billie Burke engagement at the Van Ness. The advance sale of seats for the first week is one of the largest of the season and ranks with that of "The Merry Widow."

Following Billie Burke at the Van Ness will be seen the great dramatic triumph, "The Third Degree," the work of Charles Klein, author of "The Lion and The Mouse."

Early attractions at the Van Ness are "The Third Degree," "The Traveling Salesman," Victor Moore in "The Talk of New York" and George M. Cohan in his latest work "The Yankee Prince."

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

Written exclusively for Town Talk by J. M. JACOBI

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

Formal Attire

The Colonial frock or English walking coat is popular and economical, and will always remain so, owing to the fact that, provided the material be dark, this suit can be worn almost anywhere for semi-dress informal day affairs. The material suitable for such a suit is of a dark grey mixed cloth either plain or with some indistinct pattern in it. For formal day dress, however, the plain Oxford grey or black coat and vest and the striped trousers are the very proper thing. A great many prefer the entire suit made of the same cloth and at present it is considered the best form, besides giving one, with the aid of a light waistcoat and a striped pair of trousers, four changes:

1. The suit in its entirety.
2. Coat and trousers with light waistcoats.
3. Coat and waistcoat, dark, with striped trousers.
4. Coat, light waistcoat and striped trousers.

In England, as the plate will show, coat, waistcoat and trousers are the vogue. The really smart morning coat at the present time is often trimmed with braid. A silk hat should accompany such a suit for formal occasions. The coat should be cut rather long and gracefully rounded over the thighs. As seen in the illustration, it thus makes a smart appearance. The morning coat at present is more than a rival for the frock coat and can be worn for formal afternoon occasions of all kinds. San Franciscans have kept away from this modish suit to some extent, for the last three years, but since the city has come back to its own, more attention is being paid to proper attire and the demand for this suit has been very large this season.

Proper Overcoats

In the lead for dress is probably the Chesterfield, cut large with either full back or moderate shaped back. This coat can be worn in various lengths, from the knee down to 2 or 3 inches above the ankle. Various materials are used for this model, Banokburns, Donegal Tweeds, Vicunas and even Meltons. The fancy fabrics are more for promenade or street wear and the darker fabrics for formal or dress affairs. It is perfectly proper, however, to wear fancy fabrics over the dress suits. There are different models in Chesterfield overcoats, and the newest and by far the prettiest is the Through Chesterfield. This model differs from the ordinary Chesterfield in that it has no fly, but the button holes are cut through the front. It has a very small side belt which causes the folds to drop gracefully at back and side. This for a street coat is without doubt the handsomest model shown.

Chin Coats

part of the body, the chest, and prevents one from getting cold. If worn as a dress overcoat, it keeps the collar and shirt immaculate. It can also be used as an auto coat. This protector or chin coat is a great improvement on any coat heretofore shown. Then there is the double breasted chin coat which can be worn either open or closed. There are also shown in good shops a new English rain and auto coat called the Piccadilly. This coat is made of fine mohair outside and silk and rubber inside. It is made to button to the neck and is about the only garment for men's wear that the English can make better than Americans. In view of the fact that there are a great many functions within a short time, such as the Taft banquet, we shall in our next issue write on full dress and dinner attire.

cepted until quite recently by secular historians on the strength of the following paragraph in Platina's Lives of the Pontiffs, published in Venice in 1479: "A hairy and fiery comet having then made its appearance for several days, as the mathematicians declared that there would follow a grievous pestilence, dearth, and some great calamity, Calixtus—to avert the wrath of God—ordered supplications, that if the evils were impending for the human race, He would turn all upon the Turks, the enemies of the Christian name. He likewise ordered, to move God by continual entreaty, that notice should be given by the bells to all the faithful at midday to aid by their prayers those engaged in battle with the Turk." From this statement there developed in the course of time the story of the bull of excommunication; but critical examination of the carefully preserved papal cartularies and of the records of the most ancient sees in Christendom has failed to supply any corroboration for the story, even in the modified form in which Platina first narrated it. The fulminations of the papal power have never been hurled at Halley's comet.

Although the comet pays its visits to the earth with mathematical regularity, it does not always blaze with the same brilliancy. There have been times when it stretched its flaming course halfway athwart the heavens; but at other visitations, it has been nothing but an arrow of feeble light. The visitation of 1456 was the most brilliant of which there are any records; it came then with a train of seventy degrees which gave it a brilliance thirty-five times as great as that of Orion's belt and it remained visible for one month. It is still to be ascertained just how much of an illumination the comet will favor us with this visit.

Science is waiting eagerly for its nearer approach. A satisfactory theory of the nature of comets remains to be evolved. Armed, not merely with the most powerful of telescopes, but also with the spectroscope and apparatus for taking celestial photographs, the astronomers of the world are prepared to record the coming of the comet as it has never been recorded before in the world's history. Its travels will be noted, its picture will be taken and its component parts will be analyzed. The fear and the trembling with which its approach was formerly heralded have given place to a scientific enthusiasm which assures the comet the heartiest of welcomes.

boiled away in it (the sponge). As oft as there shall be need of it, place this sponge in hot water for an hour, and let it be applied to the nostrils of him who is to be operated upon, until he has fallen asleep; and so let the surgery be performed."

All through the centuries, down to the time chloroform and ether were used, constant reference was made to anesthetics, but they seem to have been rarely employed—probably because they had proved fatal in many cases.

The Greeks and Romans were familiar with hemp, but only as a narcotic. But Hoa-tho, a Chinese physician who lived during the reign of Wei, about 230 B. C., used it as an anesthetic.

During the last century mesmerism was used as an anesthetic to a large extent in India and in some cases in England. In India the first recorded case occurred in 1845, and in a pamphlet published in 1852 Dr. Esdaile wrote an account of 261 operations that he had performed on patients while they were under the influence of mesmerism. The Indian government appointed a commission to investigate Dr. Esdaile's work, with the result that he was placed in charge of a hospital at Calcutta, that he might "extend his investigation as to the applicability of this alleged agency to all descriptions of cases, medical as well as surgical, and on all classes of patients, European as well as native." Later he was appointed a presidency-surgeon of Calcutta, and a mesmeric hospital, supported by public subscription, was placed under his superintendence.

At about the same time a number of successful experiments with mesmerism were made in Europe. But the practitioners found themselves broken in health by reason of this use of their powers. Dr. Esdaile had the same experience. At this time the use of various sorts of gases was begun with varying results. As was the case with chloroform, the United States was the scene of the first real experiments. Horace Wells, a surgeon-dentist of Hartford, Connecticut, heard a lecture in 1844 on the inhalation of gas and tried it on some of his patients, whose teeth were drawn without pain. Then he induced the faculty of the Boston Medical College to allow him to demostrate the efficacy of gas at their institution. The first patient on whom it was proposed to try it was a man who was to have his leg cut off; he lost his nerve, however, and refused to consent. This prejudiced the faculty against Dr. Well, but he was allowed to try the gas in the drawing of a tooth. The patient said that he felt some pain, whereupon Dr. Wells was overwhelmed with ridicule. He went back to home broken-hearted, gave up dentistry, took to taxidermy for a living, then engaged in various other pursuits until 1848, when, his mind becoming unsettled, he committed suicide. He died just as the world was beginning to realize the benefit of anesthetics that resulted from his experiments.

Milo

Do you know what Quality means in a Turkish Cigarette? If not get a box of "MILO." Then, any other cigarette, and try same, side by side. You'll note the delicate, aromatic mildness of the "MILO." Mildness (yet with the richness in flavor) is what costs in Turkish Tobacco, and its just this that makes the Perfect Cigarette. You'll find it in No Other.

This perfection is obtained only by owning our own plantation in Turkey—the careful watchfulness from the seeding to the finished article.

Auto Notes

Superior Judge Walter J. Trask of Los Angeles, who has been driving a Studebaker "40" for several months, has placed his order for another of these cars which he will use for pleasure only.

Mr. H. O. Cummins, the prominent mining engineer, accompanied by William Hale, of Redding, has just made a trip from that city in Cummins' Buick "White Streak," to the mining camp of Kennett. Upon arriving at their destination, after climbing over what were practically no roads at all, Cummins learned that his little Buick "White Streak" was the first automobile that ever succeeded in reaching the upper smelter town. About one month ago Harvey Sallee succeeded in going as far as Coram in his big touring car, but never before has an automobile been beheld by the citizens of Kennett upon their streets, and it is needless to say that no small amount of interest was manifested by them.

Dr. J. N. Chain, of Eureka, is again in the city after a tour of over 1500 miles through Northern California and

HOT SALT SPRING AT BYRON SPRINGS
The Mecca of Automobilists

Oregon in his Buick "White Streak." The worst road encountered on the entire trip was through Cow Creek Canyon between Grants Pass and Rossburg, Oregon, where for a distance of fifty miles very slow progress was made. From Crescent City, California, to Cummings, Dr. Chain reports splendid roads which are smooth and hard permitting fast time being made. From Cummings to Capello the roads are full of ruts which are covered with deep dust, thereby entirely eliminating the element of pleasure from touring between these points and rendering impossible any attempt at speed.

A. L. Garford, superintendent of the Studebaker-Garford factory, who has been visiting the coast for the past few days, left yesterday for Salt Lake City, his last stop out west. While here Garford stated that activity in the automobile industry was greater in the west than in any other part of the country and that San Francisco was the vortex of the activities.

The Pioneer Automobile Company is in receipt of the following telegram from the Hudson Motor Car Company: Detroit, Mich., Sept. 20, 1909. "Just received wire from Amos Pierce Auto Co., Syracuse, N. Y., as follows: 'Hanna driving Hudson demonstrator wins five mile event for cars selling twelve hundred and fifty dollars and under, in five-forty-five, from standing start, defeating two Maxwell specials, making best time in any five mile event except Oldfield in Benz. One twenty horsepower racer at Syracuse State Fair grounds, one mile circular track.'" Also of the following message, from Richmond, Va.: Ray driving Model K. Chalmers-Detroit wins city of Richmond cup in fifty mile free for all. Time 1:02:55. Also Lexington Hotel Cup for fastest mile. Time 1:12, breaking track record. Gordon Motor Co."

Several specially ordered cars of the Studebaker make are en route to the coast from the Studebaker-Garford factory, according to Chester N. Weaver, general manager of the local Studebaker branch now at South Bend, Ind. One of these is for the Hellman estate of Southern California. This last machine for the Hellmans makes the fifth that has been purchased by the members of that family during the past year. Finished in green and gold a Studebaker "30" is also en route to this city for Mrs. Emma Summers. No car has ever been finished in this style before by the Studebakers and it is expected that when this machine is delivered here it will attract considerable attention. It is of the roadster type and embodies all the latest improvements of the designer.

Jack Johnson, champion heavy weight pugilist, who owns and drives two Chalmers-Detroit cars, is having one of them overhauled and put in condition preparatory to entering the races next Saturday and Sunday at Santa Rosa. This car has already been run some ten thousand miles, but its owner knows it will give a good account of itself.

The Pioneer Automobile Company reports the sale during the last three days of Chalmers-Detroit and Hudson cars to the following: S. Y. Cockrun, Fresno; R. H. Phillips, Fresno; C. A. Day, H. Y. Maundrell, S. P. Stormer; Frank Cox, Westley, and Dr. Trueblood.

ORDER OF SALE OF CERTAN REAL ESTATE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

In the Matter of the Estate and Guardianship of JAMES HARRINGTON, Incompetent.

It appearing to this Court from the petition this day presented and filed by Mary Harrington, the guardian of the person and estate of JAMES HARRINGTON, incompetent, praying for an order of sale of certain real estate belonging to said incompetent and that it is for the best interest of said incompetent and necessary that such real estate should be sold;

It is hereby ordered that the next of kin of the said incompetent and all persons interested in the said estate appear before this Court on Monday, the 11th day of October, 1909, at ten o'clock, at the Courtroom of this Court, in the Grant Building, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted for the sale of such estate.

And it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for at least three successive weeks before the said hearing in "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in the said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Dated, September 2, 1909. THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

Vivid Stage Story

Despite the number of novels dealing with stage life and all the biographies and autobiographies of stars and the deliberate exposures by stage managers of the tricks and illusions of their trade, there yet remained much to be said. In "The Bill Toppers" Andre Castaigne has given us an illuminating series of pictures of the seamy underside of the vaudeville stage and the making of "artistes"; and any stage-struck miss who, despising the warning fore finger of other monitors, reads "The Bill Toppers" and still persists in her desire will deserve whatever success she may attain, for if she has not genius she most certainly will have the industry that persists despite discouragement. Lily Clifton is the abiding figure in this story, the one whom we have always with us, but others appear and disappear and reappear as fortuitous circumstances direct, meeting for a moment and parting for years, carrying back and forth the gossip and chance stories picked up in London, in Berlin, in Sydney, in San Francisco, in Calcutta or Caracas or Santiago. Lily's father began his self-supporting career as a small clerk. He took up bicycling when the wheel was introduced, became a professional rider, invented and perfected a few tricks which he taught his wife, and imparted to their child as soon as she was old enough to make an appearance and then joined a circus. At four years of age Lily's earliest recollection was "I was sitting on Ma's shoulders and Ma on Pa's and Pa on the bike." At eight she had confused and jumbled recollections of New Zealand, Australia, India, the Strait Settlements, Cape Town, Natal and other ends of the earth, and at that age she was "the New Zealander on Wheels," with Ma retired, Pa acting as her manager, and herself, graduated from the circus to the music hall, the sole support of the Clifton family. Pa Clifton really believed his little daughter an infant phenomenon, and Ma was most pleased to be relieved from responsibility and exertion. Clifton thought his Lily needed but to be seen to be appreciated and that the whisper of her accomplishments would bring American, English and Continental managers to his door in supplication, and he set out to make his dreams accomplished facts. America was his first goal and San Francisco gave him his first back set, for instead of scanning his photographs and posters, the managers and agents demanded his birth certificate and quoted the law against infant performers. Mexico was more liberal, and he turned his back on our inhospitable shores. Up to this time he had been all kindness and admiration of his wonderful child, but down near the borderline he received the real blow to his vanity. The train halted at an out-door exhibition at which there appeared a trick bicyclist performing with ease stunts that Pa Clifton had never so much as dreamed of. He was forced to admit that his Lily knew nothing at all and her Pa no more, but he lost no time in coming to terms with "Trampy," who was to accompany them to Mexico and teach the child. Then began hard times. No longer was she the spoiled darling, but the victim of her father's ambition. Early in the morning she was waked with the call of "Come along Lily, to work," and in the middle of the forenoon, when Pa had exhausted himself with his coaching, the unfortunate mite was passed over to her trainer. Afternoon saw a renewal of the practice, and the plaintive wail, "Pa, I can't! Pa, I can't," was met with the buckle end of a belt and the rejoinder, "But you MUST, my little lady." In Denver Lily was permitted to perform her "childish tricks," nothing difficult or dangerous, of course not; and again in Chicago, Pittsburg, but New York again demanded birth certificates. London, and now we begin to see the real thing. Pa decided to take apprentices and manage a troupe, and the whole miserable business of securing the unfortunate little waifs, beating them into shape and defrauding them at every turn is put before us. The "Woolly Legs," the "New Zealanders on Wheels," though younger, are typical of the stage "families," "sisters," and "groups," virtually the property of their managers, often relatives who might be expected to show some consideration for their own flesh and blood. They are carefully enough guarded, never permitted to make acquaintances or intimacies, but the solicitude is not for their morals or manners—only a precaution lest they form attachments which will disintegrate combinations and reduce profits. It is a curious picture—on the one side the girls, mere children, permitting freedoms of speech and action which would horrify the outside world and on the other a lack of sophistication which would put a normal ten-year-old out of countenance. Girls earning literal fortunes for their elders but content to stitch their own cheap stage finery and ecstatic over a bit of six-penny tinsel jewelry; knowledge that should be withheld from them for years on the tips of their tongues, but comprehension of it beyond their understanding; and the boastings, the conquests, the contracts, the gifts, all built upon trivial occurrences or out of pure imagination; then the fears of competition, of stolen stunts, of new attractions, of idle weeks and spiteful stage managers and untrustworthy agents; the reckless extravagances and the heart-breaking economies, the superstitions, and above all the haunting specter of old-age overtaking one in a profession where only the young are at home or of disablement and pauperism. Lily Clifton was, on the whole rather a good sort. In a different environment, with rational care and consideration her natural instincts towards refinement would have developed her into a conventional if not a narrow-minded young lady. As it was, she saw the seamy side of life too closely, and the viciously vituperative tongue of Ma, afraid that her provider would be spirited away, and the ambition of Pa, who treated her more and more as a machine to be wound up to a certain pitch, together with her lack of sophistication, her absence of suspicion, led her to attempt to escape from one misery only to plunge into another—to run away from the brutality at home only to find herself domesticated with another variety of the same thing; and though she skates near enough to the brink of the abyss, she manages to clear it by a narrow margin, thanks to Jimmy, electrician on the boat by which she journeyed to England when she was "that high"—Jimmy, despised as a "Josser," but with the inventive brain and mechanical skill, who rises to be a "Bill Topper," and to place Lily at the top of all bill-toppers, a veritable star amongst the stars. No doubt there will be endless controversy as to the truth and fairness of Mr. Castaigne's pictures, but there is no question as to their vividness and convincingness to those who know the life from the front of the footlights only. No on who reads the story can fail to regard the vaudeville stars with greater consideration than before, and it is certainly a strong plea for the retirement of the infant phenomena. Illustrations are by the author. Published by the Bobbs-Merrill Co., Indianapolis.

The Pacific Motor Car Company will exhibit at the Automobile Show two very attractive Electric Cars, one with a closed brome type and the other an open car. They will also exhibit a six-cylinder Chassis of their Stevens-Duryea Model. This same polished Chassis was exhibited at the New York Show.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 24,299, Dept. 12.

ELLA REEVES, Plaintiff,

vs.

JOHN T. REEVES, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to JOHN T. REEVES, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion and wilful neglect, and determining and adjudging that plaintiff is the owner of the certain real property described in the complaint herein, as her separate property, and also for alimony and counsel fees; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 23d day of July, A. D. 1909.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE ON SALE OF REAL PROPERTY

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 7926, Department 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of JOHN GEHERTY, Deceased.

CECELIA GEHERTY, the Administratrix of the Will annexed of the Estate of JOHN GEHERTY, deceased, having heretofore presented to the Court and filed with the Clerk thereof her verified petition praying for an Order of this Court authorizing, empowering and directing her to sell certain real property, in said petition particularly described, belonging to the estate of said deceased, and it appearing to the Court that it is necessary to sell the whole of the real property in said petition described, to pay the debts outstanding against the said deceased, and the debts, expenses and charges of administration and the family allowance, and that it is for the advantage, benefit and best interest of the estate and those interested therein that said real estate be sold:

It is hereby ordered that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased be, and they are hereby directed to appear before the above-entitled Court in the Courtroom of Department No. 10 thereof, in the Grant Building, Southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on Monday, the 25th day of October, A. D. 1909, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. of said day, to then and there show cause, if any they have, why an order should not be granted to said Administratrix with the Will annexed, for the sale of all said real property.

It is further ordered that a copy of this Order to Show Cause be published in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation, printed and published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, once a week for four (4) successive weeks.

Dated, San Francisco, September 16, A. D. 1909.

Mr. Pickwick's Inn

The Leather Bottle Inn of Pickwick fame is still standing in the quaint old village of Cobham. Dickens spent several days and nights there before and after the writing of "Pickwick," and his visitors at Gads Hill were generally taken for a walk through the woods to be shown the picturesque inn.

Today it is a shrine for Dickens pilgrims who visit it in increasing numbers and leave their names in the well worn bulky visitors' books. Still the house remains a village inn of an older time, with low ceilings, oak panels, small windows and heavy furniture.

It is very much as it was when the immortal Boz spent his time there creating the scene which is at least as well known as any other in the story of Mr. Pickwick's feasts and fancies; but the Dickens room, the bar parlor and in fact the whole house is overflowing with prints and pictures and sketches of the famous novelist and the creations of his fertile mind.

It was in the churchyard across the road from the Leather Bottle—as it was then known, though now more often called the Pickwick Inn—that Mr. Pickwick reasoned long and earnestly with the despondent Tupman, who had fortified himself at the Leather Bottle for a premature departure from an unresponsive world.

The one street of the picturesque village of Cobham forms an avenue of neat cottages, with an atmosphere of contented old age characteristic of the county so famously described by Dickens as unapproachable for its "apples, cherries, hops and women." It is in one of the loveliest parts of Kent, about three miles from Rochester.

The Papal Cook

Stefano Inchiostro is the name of the Pope's cook. He has recently been relating his experience in the "Veneto," from which it is seen that his post is a veritable sinecure.

For twenty-seven years he was the cook in the seminary of the Patriarch of Venice, the dignity held by the Pope before his call to the chair of St. Peter, and consequently was well known to his Holiness. On June 22, 1903, Stefano received a summons from his old master to repair to the Vatican.

He went, and was conducted to the presence of the Pope, and it was only the geniality of the pontiff that placed the cook at his ease, for he was greatly moved.

The cook enables us to have a glimpse of the daily life of his venerable master, who is an example of Horace's "obiter" that change of place does not alter the man. After celebrating mass the pontiff takes a little coffee. Precisely at noon he lunches, in company of Mgr. Pescini and Mgr. Bresson. They are always served by a particular valet de chambre.

The repast is modest in the extreme. Some soup, a little meat from the soup, and rarely is there a roasted joint. At 9 at night the Pope takes his supper, more frugal, if possible, than the midday meal. Vegetables and a little meat is the night repast. In winter the Pope takes more soup than in summer, made from dried vegetables.

His Holiness is very fond of the "polentina" (soupe de mais), made as it was in the days past in Venice, and it is generally accompanied by some fish sent from Civita Vecchia or Venice.

Mature Beauties

Helen of Troy was over forty when she perpetrated the most famous elopement on record. As the siege of Troy lasted for a decade she was far from youthful when the ill-fortune of Paris returned her to her husband, who is credited with having received her with unquestioning love and gratitude.

Pericles wedded Aspasia when she was thirty-six, and for thirty years afterward she maintained her reputation for undiminished beauty.

Cleopatra was over thirty when Antony fell under her spell.

Anne of Austria was described as the most beautiful queen in Europe when Buckingham and Richelieu were her jealous admirers.

President Taft

Because of what too frequently happens on such occasions as that which absorbed our attention this week they have been described as "local casualties." This because they breed disaffections among ambitious individuals of local distinction and because it is never possible to foretell whether the foremost local personage will prove himself a loquacious fool of good intentions or a man of taste and judgment. Nevertheless a visit from the Chief Magistrate of the United States is a blessing. If it does nothing more it stimulates patriotism; and the sense of himself which it leaves is not to be reckoned as of minor importance if his individuality is wholesomely impressive. Happily Mr. Taft is a President about whom there is something more than sentimental glamor. He embodies all the characteristic qualities which have enabled epoch-making statesmen to effect wisely great changes in politics and in public opinion: a devotion to high principles, essential fairness and large compelling common sense. There is something delightful in his calm courageous probity, and it seems to have a charm for thoughtful men who employ their intellect in forming their judgment and are not to be carried away by their emotions. Not classical in his oratory, but forceful and forthright, he diffuses faith in his purposes. His talks give one the impression that according to his philosophy principles should accompany rather than serve as a substitute for morals. Of an amiable temperament, abounding in good nature, instinctively he arraigns principles in preference to men. His purpose is not to lacerate but to heal. Those people that can be fooled only part of the time will find enlightenment in his speeches; those that can be fooled all the time could do worse than to read them.

His Wholesome Influence

"Swinging round the circle," as it is somewhat contemptuously called, and establishing intimate relations with the people, President Taft is performing a great public service. In many respects the itinerant President is in the nature of a liberal education. He is doing much toward dissolving misapprehensions, and by his instructive utterances he is inculcating noble precepts and diffusing sane and lofty sentiments. Thanks to the Prophets of Unrest we have come to realize that "swinging round the circle" is one of the most important functions of the presidential office. For ever since he started on his journey the President has been employed in rendering negligible the misrepresentations of the muckrakers, counteracting the poisons incessantly and insidiously instilled by the half-baked philosophers of magazinedom and the paranoiacs of higher politics that attitudinize in the circle Chautauqua. These professional agitators would constitute a grave menace to the peace and stability of the State were their reckless assertions not to be contradicted, their sophistries not to be refuted by high and reliable authority. Constantly preoccupied with the instruction of others they have no leisure to instruct themselves. They are in absolute ignorance of the principle enunciated by Edmund Burke when he said that no man should dream of beginning the reformation of a State by its subversion, but should approach the defects of government as the wounds of a father, with pious awe and trembling solicitude. These fomenters of popular prejudice would have us believe that Mammon in his devil wagon is joyriding us down, and that a recrudescence of Rooseveltism is essential to the salvation of the nation. Now we conceive that the better acquainted the people become with Mr. Taft the less likelihood will there be of success attending the efforts that are being made to foster mischievous delusions. The President has been doing much toward clarifying the atmosphere and putting the people in a receptive mood for the truth with reference to statesmen who have scorned the applause of the groundlings. And what is better he has been converting the people to a new attitude toward certain institutions of their country which have been falling into disfavor. How great is the service he is rendering we may judge from the panic into which he has thrown certain persons who would out-Roosevelt his predecessor and who have been shocked by sentiments that were once the watchwords of the most revered patriots in the history of our country.

A Test of Friendship

Mr. Roosevelt is still the tutelary god of the masses, their standard figure of perfection; a circumstance that proves the incredible durability of conceptions formed by the imagination and the amazing repugnance of the human biped to disenchantment. Far from the scene of his triumphs Mr. Roosevelt's figure fades not, his name persists, even in the retrospect he charms. Anything that savors of heterodoxy with reference to his dogma is anathema. Mr. Taft believes himself to be in sympathy with the teachings of Mr. Roosevelt. This is a case that illustrates strikingly the power of friendship. Our friends see not our faults. Mr. Taft is insensible of Mr. Roosevelt's. A warm personal friend of the ex-President he has ever believed in the sincerity of him and in the wisdom of his basic policies. Indeed so infatuated is he with Mr. Roosevelt, so passionately partial toward his former chief, that he has never perceived how far the latter came from squaring performance with profession. The mischief done by Roosevelt was not in the policies which he enunciated but in the sentiments which he diffused. The first to denounce muckrakers, the first to apply an epithet in describing them, in the end he became their chief source of inspiration. The professed enemy of demagogues, yet he devoted himself to the dissemination of the fatuous heresy that increase in the power of numbers was essential to the mitigation of the evils sown by a corrupt minority, urging the while the self-satisfied and stupid masses to strive for emancipation from the authority of the fundamental principles of our institutional form of government. Justice, the great standing policy of civil society, he conceived to be a matter not of principle but of personal viewpoint. Now it is the evil done by Roosevelt in his moments of fine frenzy that Mr. Taft is trying to eradicate, but apparently he is entirely unconscious of the fact that what is obnoxious to his sense of right is the result of precedents established by his erratic friend. Of course it is quite likely that he is under no misapprehension, but whatever may be the case, it is clear enough to intelligent persons that Mr. Taft can conscientiously adhere to Mr. Roosevelt's economic and governmental policies without employing Mr. Roosevelt's methods or indulging in rough rider tantrums. But of course he will not please the muckrakers unless, after the manner of Mr. Roosevelt, he supplies material with which to give color to their most extravagant and terrifying pictures of the state of the nation. Apparently Mr. Taft is not intent upon meriting their approbation. He has given us confessions of his political faith and a sort of creed of his political morality, and we believe that it is his purpose to inspire respect for Constitutional principles. He believes there are many abuses that should be remedied, many reforms that should be instituted, but he has faith in the institutions of his country, and his character forbids him to attempt the showy displays and sensational exhibitions which win momentary popularity. Educated in the public service, possessed of a cultivated and judicial mind, better fitted by experience for the duties which he is discharging than any other statesman that ever entered upon the performance of the functions of his high office, his claim to the confidence of the people is an intellectual claim, and it is bound to prevail.

Education and Religion

The educational methods of American schools, colleges and universities are never long free from criticism. Unfortunately most of the criticism is of the destructive sort calculated to induce feelings of pessimistic indifference rather than of active concern for the eradication of the evils that are supposed to exist. Of this sort was the series of magazine articles recently published and widely discussed in which the fundamentals of college education were vigorously assaulted. Of this sort also was the declaration of a certain bishop who announced that he would as lief send a boy to Hell as to one of the large American colleges. And not long since the National Education Association, convened in Denver, contributed to the same kind of criticism by indorsing the statement that the colleges were failures to the extent at least that they exerted a ruinous influence on the secondary schools. This sort of criticism should be sparingly indulged and grudgingly accepted if the defects of American educational methods are to be remedied. Another sort of criticism, constructive in character, seeks to find the happy mean for our schools between the shifting social and educational needs of the people and the fixed standards and ideals which have always governed the inculcation of general culture. This is a herculean task and it is no disgrace to a body of sincere high-minded educators that they have not yet accomplished the compromise, for compromise it is, since it involves the acceptance of something less than the best that education has to offer. There is one aspect of the educational problem which many educators shrink from attacking but which is thrusting itself ever more insistently upon their notice and that is the combination of religious with secular education in our lower and higher public schools. Education which ignores religion is irreligious education and to irreligion with its corollary of materialism, our most profound thinkers attribute the rifeness of crime and sin in American life. If to educate means to develop the faculties of the soul, the religious faculties must be developed as well as the intellectual and moral. Here is a problem for all that American educators have of fortitude and delicacy. Let them ponder the apostolic dictum that "piety is profitable to all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." And let them give heed to these words of Guizot: "In order to make proper education truly good and socially useful it must be fundamentally religious. It is necessary that national education should be given and received in the midst of a religious atmosphere, and that religious impressions and religious observations should penetrate into all parts. Religion is not a study or an exercise, to be restricted to a certain place or a certain hour; it is a faith and a law which ought to be felt everywhere, and which, after this manner alone, can exercise all its beneficial influence upon our mind and our life."

Love Among Poets and Philosophers

That there is such a thing as psychic affinity between two persons is a theory which has received the endorsement of a Chicago professor who speaks from experience. A year ago he was a prosaic, respectable married man. In spite of a profound regard for the moral code he was "attracted," as iron to a loadstone, from the mother of his children to an unattached female. Thus was it demonstrated to his satisfaction that there are psychic influences that control our love affairs. This theory, so valuable for salving a sensitive conscience, is not of modern origin. Nay, it is as old as the hills. The immortal Goethe based a novel on it and called it "Elective Affinities." He argued that when two souls are united by an amorous affinity nothing can pull them apart. According to some of the ancient philosophers Love rules supreme over all elements and is not to be denied by human device or intention. They believed that manifestations of this ruling passion were to be noted even among inanimate things. They declared that it chained star to star, that it brought showers to the passionate earth, and they included all the chemical affinities of atoms and molecules as manifestations of love. "Just as man and woman attract on another," said an old dry-as-dust philosopher, "so oxygen attracts hydrogen and in loving union with it forms water, that mighty omnipresent element without which no life nor thought would be possible." Seriously and with no sense of poetry, another exclaimed: "Potassium and phosphorous entertain such a violent passion for oxygen that even under water they unite with their beloved object and burn." From this standpoint it is evident that the Chicago professor has abundant authority to support his theory. But if he were to consult biologists he would find that what he conceives to be psychical is in reality sensual. The biologists tell us there is a curious analogy between human and bird love, and that there are animals of a profligate disposition remarkable for their infidelities. There are Don Juans even among pigeons. The poets of course acquisce in the panerotic vagaries of the amorous philosophers, and in them our Chicago pedagogue may find much to justify him in the desertion of his wife. Shakespeare, for example, tells us of purple sails so perfumed that they exhaled a charm that made the winds love-sick with them. And Dante was positive that the power of love was irresistible. After seeing Beatrice for the first time, "love," he says, "quite governed my soul." Not only were her swet smiles the highest goal of his desires, but so powerful was the spell of her presence that he was obliged to avoid her. But Dante was a medieval lover who hyper-idealized his passion. When for the first time Beatrice denied him her smile, he went into a lonely place to bathe the ground with most bitter tears. The Chicago professor never had to do anything so foolish. His experience was uniformly that of an irresistible attraction which, in the fullness of his egotism, he has taken the pains to differentiate from the pornerastic passion that has its analogy among the beasts of the field.

Poking Fun at Our Heroes

Showing How Foreigners, Particularly the English, Are Trying to Divert Attention from the Glory of the Achievements of Cook and Peary by Jocular and Satirical Articles Wherein Envy is Thinly Veiled Beneath Ill-humored Though Occasionally Witty Depreciation

By Francis West

Considering that even Americans have found much in the conduct of Cook and Peary since their return from the ice-fields that it has been difficult to stomach, it may be imagined that foreigners have exhausted their ingenuity in accentuating those points of the polar controversy which are calculated to cast discredit upon the two explorers and to dim the glory of an achievement which, no matter how the dispute may be decided, will belong exclusively to a citizen of the United States.

The newspapers throughout Europe have exercised their splenetic wit upon this subect ever since the first blast of the unfortunate controversy went sounding around the world. British journalists in particular have racked their brains for new forms of jocularity with which to treat the matter, displaying anything but that Anglo-Saxon fellow-feeling to which international oratory of the "hands across the sea" brand has made so many touching if unconvincing references. Probably one of the best natured and cleverest bits of English writing in this class appeared in a London evening paper which recently printed a communication from the "president of the Royal Eskimo Academy of Sciences," claiming the honor of the discovery of the North Pole for Ahwelsh and E-dun-a-bunk (a synonym of Etukishook), but admitting they were assisted by Commander Peary and Dr. Cook, and then dropped into this parody of a well known piece of verse:

Ah-gumdrop-welsh and E-dun-a-bunk were very great men, particular!
They used to climb up very steep bergs, exceedingly steep, perpendicular!
The bergs that they climbed were innumerable bergs, exceedingly so, multitudinous!
And every berg was a very high berg, exceedingly high, altitudinous!
And those very high bergs, those very steep bergs (which makes the thing more inexpressible),
Those uncountable bergs, those impossible bergs, were every one inaccessible!

Of course the mythical school child who writes a composition of naive humor and innocent satire has been pressed into service by the canny London humorists to satisfy the needs of the occasion. Here are some of the efforts which are quite seriously attributed to youngsters:

"There is now a lot of talk about the discovery of the North Pole," begins an unnamed girl of ten. "Dr. Cook was supposed to have reached it, but when he got there Capt. Peary came up over the side and told Mr. Cook the Pole belonged to him. They both became very angry, and waved the Stars and Stripes, but presently agreed to leave it in the hands of the President of America." Says another precocious child: "A lot of people have been trying to find the North Pole, but when they got there they died, and their bones were found by Dr. Cook and Capt. Peary. The reason why Dr. Cook and Capt. Peary did not die was because they were Americans." Again another essayist affirms that Capt. Peary reached the North Pole on a Dreadnought. He adds: "The reason why he went by sea was because it was cheaper than going by train. The discovery of the North Pole is a good thing, because it is the end of the world."

One does not ordinarily look to the scholarly Jewish World for playful humor, yet even this dignified publication has been stirred from its habitual gravity by the Cook-Peary controversy. This paper, after referring with pride to Dr. Cook's Jewish origin, says that the North Pole is the only place on earth, except the other Pole, where it is impossible for Jews to settle. Why? The Jew is commanded to turn his face to the east when he prays. How can he do it where there is no east? Then how can he say morning prayers every day when the polar night lasts six months? It would mean morning prayer once a year. Then what about the Omar? How can he count forty-nine evenings in the seven weeks between the second day of Passover and Pentecost when there is only one long evening in the whole of the polar year? He would not know when the Sabbath was in or out. "Suppose," the Jewish World concludes, "the long polar night began with a Sabbath evening. We should not be able to do work for months. Even that is not the worst. Suppose the long polar day began on a fast. How would you like a Yom Kippur or a Tishi B'Ab six months long?"

An establishment the name of which is a household word in England presents a spectacular piece, "The North Pole; a Tropical Illusion." The Parisians have a lighter touch. A revue is in course of preparation there at one of the most popular operetta theatres under the punning title of "Un Coup d'Epaule." The stars here are to be Mlle. Polaire and M. Polin. Parisians of course turn everything into fun, and so it is not surprising to find that a game called "Discovering the North Pole" is the feature of the present annual Paris toy show. This particular toy shows the top of the earth painted white, with an explorer on either side of the pole, one dressed in white bearskin and the other in black bearskin. They have the names Peary and Cook painted on them. The explorers each hold a large flag the staff of which has to sink into a socket representing the North Pole. By turning a handle behind the figures the flagstaffs move up and down until one of the two figures has succeeded in fixing the staff into the socket. The Germans are severely practical as ever. The name of "Dr. Cook brandy" has been given to a home distilled product which in accordance with the new law may not be described as "cognac brandy."

But to return to the English. Not all of their unfriendly criticism of our American explorers is couched in terms of badinage and light humor. It is not too much to say that the English would be thoroughly pleased if the verdict of science should cast discredit upon both explorers. Thus R. B. Cunninghame Graham, a great traveler and a consummate master of language, said in a recent article: "It has been reserved for Messrs. Peary, Cook and Co. to discover and make the North Pole ridiculous. No man of any other nationality could have done one-half they have done in the field of Arctic exploration. Hudson left us the legend, Franklin laid down his life, Nares, Rae, and Ross worked, dreamed, starved, sledged, trudged, wintered in the dark, and devoted their heroic lives to the great idea. None of them seem to have cared an atom about themselves. Not one of them thought about advertisement. Money never entered into their calculations. We do not hear that any one of them took a megaphone on any of his expeditions. They did not think of securing the exclusive right to any telegraphic system; above all they were not jealous of each other's fame. . . . Now, perhaps in order to pull down and bedaub with mud the last of our illusions, Messrs. Cook and Peary, with their bags of gum-drops for the Esquimaux, their cinematographs, advance agents, and "Old Glories," appear upon the scene and straight the whole thing turns to comedy." Cunninghame Graham contemptuously suggests that Cook and Peary had better form a company, set up a turnstile at the North Pole and charge a penny to go in and see the Great Nail.

Th British are credited with good memories, yet they seem to forget that just such another controversy as this Cook-Peary dispute raged in their own press between Burton and Speke about the discovery of the sources of the Nile. The two great English travelers exhibited a great deal more bitterness at that time than Cook and Peary have shown. It will be remembered that in his expedition of 1857-59 Speke claimed virtually to have discovered the source of the great river in Lake Victoria Nyanza, having pushed on to the lake alone, leaving Burton behind sick. Few believed Speke's narrative and Burton was not among them. In 1863 Speke and Grant discovered the source beyond dispute but still Burton denied the possibility. It was arranged that the rival explorers should hold a public disputation on the subject before the British Association at Bath in 1864; but on the morning of the meeting Speke was found dead in a ditch with a gun lying beside him. Considering the acrimony with which that historic dispute raged, even after Speke's death, the English should be just a little tolerant of our controversial excitement.

The Dead Calypso

A Revised Version by Louis A. Robertson

Editor's Note: Robertson was never satisfied with the form in which The Dead Calypso originally appeared and he has recently completed a new version which differs considerably from the old. The Dead Calypso was first published in Town Talk and the editor takes pleasure in placing the revised version before Robertson's admirers. Critical comment on the changes which the poet has made will be found in The Spectator.

Where be thy witcheries now, woman of wonderful beauty?
Priestess of pleasure and love, thy myrtle hath withered at last.
Sweet was the soul-searing cult taught by thy liberal kisses,
Sweeter the chalice of love formed by thy sensuous mouth,
Ripe as the rapturing grape, rich as the rose in its redness,
But unto them that did drink fatal as waters of death.
Left unto thee are the dregs, bitter and biting as wormwood,
Freezing the blood in thy veins, leaving thee rigid and cold.

Strange that these pale lethal lips, prodigal once with such passion,
Wreathe themselves into a smile chaste as a maiden's in sleep!
Ah, how they've changed since I first crushed their voluptuous vintage!
Shrunk is their soft silken skin, as when the tropical sun
Drinking the life of the grape, leaves it abandoned and shriveled, Gibbeted on its own vine, swinging like felon forgot.

Mute is thy murmuring voice, silent its passionate pleading,
Which, like a song of the sea heard in a whispering shell,
Called me so softly to where, rising through ravishing roses,
Love's longed-for heaven appeared, fair as a rhapsodist's dream;
Misted with halos of gold, yet but a vanishing splendour
Miraged in exquisite grace over a desert of death.

Dead is the light in thine eyes, yet Recollection recalls them
Beaming with beauty like stars mirrored in slumbering seas,
Where through the darkness they dream till the warm kisses of Eos
Woo them away from the waves back to their home in the skies.

Oft when the roses of Love blushed with the poppies of Passion,
Crowning our cup of desire, hid in the draught was a charm,
Which when thy lips fell from mine, sighing and sated, would drug thee
Into a deep dreamless swoon where the bright violet beams
Faded away from thine eyes, which in the sensuous slumber
Shone 'neath their uplifted lids white as the Lilies of Death.
Moistened with ecstasy's tears were the rapt azures when turning Into thy love laden brain, there Passion's secret to find;
Leaving their opaline orbs blind in the trance that enthralled them,
Till my lips, clinging to thine, coaxed the lost irises back.

Now under curtains of wax, lustreless crescents of whiteness,
Cold as the frost on the pane, hint of those glorious hours;
Where is their luminous beam which like the treacherous beacons
Lighted by wreckers to lure mariners on to their doom,
O'er Life's unpiloted sea shone with a balc and a beauty,
Till the bold credulous bark dashed on the rock of thy heart?

Springtide of Life when the Soul, hearing Love's wakening whisper, Glows in the flame that desire lights in the blood to betray!
Summer that seethes in the veins, purpling Lust's grapes for the crushing,
Which in a wine-press of pain leave the black dregs of despair.

This I was taught when thy heart, drunk with delirious passion,
Changed to a charnel where lurked ghosts of thy deep-buried past,
Which from their sepulchre stole once in a still starless midnight,
Bearing a chalice, rose-wreathed, drugged with the lees of dead loves.
Draining the perilous draught, swift through my pulses the purple
Rushed while our wet mingling mouths crushed the rich raptures that curse;

Then learned I Lust's lurid lore, whispered by thee, whom I worshiped,
Whom I had deemed half divine, shrined as a saint in my heart.
Oh, how it leaped when thy lips, voicing the vows that enthralled me,
Sighed like a girl's whose pure love murmurs with virginal bliss!
Ah, how it bled when they turned, babbling in sleep that betrayed them,
Seeking mine own in the dark, breathing some lost lover's name!

Swiftly the meshes of silk spun into steel, but I lingered,
Fondling the fetters I feared, fearing to fling them away;
Lost to the lips I had loved, yet with the thirst of a drunkard
Draining the draught that enslaved e'en while the spirit recoiled.
Day after day, as the scales fell from mine eyes, I beheld thee
Garbed in the glamour of Lust rise from the ashes of Love.
Night after night, though my fears fled in thy fervid caresses,
Soon every kiss seemed a curse crowning my love with despair,
Driving me far from thy side, bearing a heart that was broken,
Oft in white alien arms seeking thy face to forget.

Then came the night when my soul wakened and heard a weird whisper,
Sweet as the Spring's vesper breeze, calling me back to thy breast;
Hitherward swiftly I came, baleful and black grew the shadows,
Hope, that had glowed in my heart, faded away as I stole
Silently here to thy side, finding thee steeped in Death's slumber, Breathless, but beautiful still, clothed for thy couch in the clay.

Why should I bend over thee, cursing the fate that hath foiled me,
That hath stepped in to destroy all that I lived for and loved,
When I recall that thy heart hid in its depths the redeeming
Love that will lead me to thee when I am shrouded and cold.

Weeping, I lay on thy brow Love's lonely lips that betroth me
Ever to thee in the skies, where thou are waiting for me,
Where all the lapses of Life fade in a faith beatific,
Where the pure Lilies of Peace bloom ever fragrant and fair.

Long, long ago in the past, God's proud and white-pinioned angels
Found in the daughters of Earth all that their souls could desire;
Why should I wonder that thou, fairest of beautiful women,
Didst with thy sorceries snare the souls and the bodies of men?

Where are thy worshipers now, they who did pant to embrace thee?
Where is the homage they breathed deep in these death-deafened ears?
Where are the gems and the gold, offered with love, that could make thee
Faithless to him whose cold lips whisper of passionless peace?

Monsieur Le Marqnis

By Isabelle Kaiser (From the French)

She was an actress. He was a marquis.

They did not love each other. They were not even acquainted. She shone upon the stage; he shone nowhere. She was a star at its zenith, hailed with acclamation every evening at the Theatre Lyrique; he was merely a sun that had set. No one noticed him as he passed, for his name, though inscribed in the heraldic records of France, was not written on his face. He was pale from want, and if his coat-of-arms bore gules with a bend or, his doublet showed threadbare, and his shoes and shirt-frill made sport for the wind through innumerable queer little holes.

She wore diamonds in the evening on her bare shoulders; men ruined themselves for her. He had ruined himself for others. But she after all was only the Demoiselle Ninon Duchene of the Theatre Lyrique, while he was always the Marquis Axel de Saint-Fleury, and if he had possessed a decent coat in which to present himself, the doors of the salons in the Boulevard Saint-Germain would have flown wide before him: doors through which the beauty and the diamonds of Demoiselle Duchene would never, never pass.

She knew it, by sufficient experience. She was tormented by ambition. Her name signified a tree, but it proved singularly cramping for the bird-like soul that dreamed of building its nest on a lofty bough.

The singing-woman lived in luxury, and the nobleman starved inch by inch. She heard people talk of the ruined marquis, and a fantastic idea took possession of her.

She opened negotiations with him by letter.

She was greatly courted, and she wished to change her plebeian name, but not to saddle herself with a husband.

He was intensely wretched, and resigned himself to accepting gold wherewith to prolong his life, but not a "bourgeoise" wife to share it with him.

They came to terms. The strange bargain was struck, and Demoiselle Duchene drew up the clauses of a very original marriage contract.

It was agreed that they should marry and separate at once; that the Marquis should always behave toward the actress as though they were unacquainted; and that she should pay him 300 livres before the ceremony and 1200 livres per annum during her life. The marriage took place, and all the terms of the agreement were scrupulously observed.

II.

Some years after this marriage the breath of Revolution swept so fiercely over France that the social edifice crumbled to pieces. All classes, all destines, were scattered like grain beneath the onslaught of a blind and insane winnower. From the ruins arose the convulsive evolution of a new world: a monstrous outburst of ideas, of genius, crime and virtue, madness and heroism.

People lived on the brink of death. Death was now the supreme, the most noble act of life. At the whim of raving committees men and women were hurried in batches to the scaffold. All were suspected, all guiltless alike. The faith that had upheld past generations was disparaged and scoffed at, royalty was unpopular, great names were marked out for destruction, the aristocracy torn up by the roots.

And the dickey-bird soul of Ninon Duchene, which had dreamed of nesting at the top of the tree, was among the first to be caught in the storm. She was flung into a dungeon in the Carmes prison. Citoyenne Duchene would assuredly have been allowed to trill and warble in peace; the Marquise de Saint-Feury must undergo the doom reserved for all women of her social class.

One day in Thermidor 1794, she was brought out into the courtyard of the Conciergerie. Her name was on the list handed that morning to Fouquier-Tinville. It was her passport to the guillotine.

When she came into the court that was the antechamber of death, opening straight by its door on to Samson's wagon, she tottered as she walked and trembled in every limb; two guards had to drag her along. She had never learnt how to live, and death could not dignify her.

She had denied the noble name which had once been the object of her ambition, and which she had borne with so much ostentation. She had proclaimed her plebeian origin. She was not believed. Her carriages, her linen, her writing-paper divulged the marchioness' coronet, and the people who thronged the parapet, the sovereign ferocious People who had rushed hither to look on, to applaud acts of courage and to brand faint hearts with disgrace, hooted contempt at the woman who had haggled with her judges for her life.

She was young and beautiful, and she clung to life. Hope, the angel of the doomed, had not forsaken her in prison, and was with her still, here in the ill-omened yard. With painful eagerness she scanned the crowd, and the wilderness of the sea of faces struck terror to her heart. Not a single friendly countenance. Not one from among all those who had acclaimed her on her stage-evenings of triumph, and could bear witness on her behalf. No relative; no protector; no one to tell the judges not to behead a young woman who knew only how to laugh and sing, who was not ready to die. Of heroism she knew nothing, never having soared towards such heights. No one had ever taken the trouble to teach her things of that kind.

There were about a hundred unfortunate persons penned up there for the slaughter; but when their names fell from the lips of the public arraigner, the condemned men and women rose and walked with tranquil step towards the cart, bidding one another a simple farwell with a look, a handclasp. Freedom was awaiting them at the foot of the bloodstained guillotine, the freedom of the Beyond.

Among all these Ninon alone was not ready. Suddenly she turned white. From the lips of the ruffian in authority there fell a sonorous name—her own:

"Marquise de Saint-Fleury!"

She stood speechless, her tongue paralysed with horror.

But from the spectators crowded together on the parapet a voice rang out, confidently, haughtily calm:

"Present!"

The judges were thunderstruck; they raised their heads in bewilderment.

"Hi, you up there," bellowed one of the guards, "stop that trifling!"

Collecting himself again after this untimely interruption, the arraigner repeated the summons—

"Marquise de Saint-Fleury!"

And for the second time, with now a shade of impatience, from the parapet above fell the voice, compelling attention; for the ring of truth was in it as it answered proudly to the bloodthirsty roll-call:

"Present, I tell you!"

There was a moment of confusion and uncertainty. The crowd cursed and swore at the interruption.

"Bring him here!" ordered the judges.

Several hands had already fallen on the man's shoulder. Courteously, with the utmost willingness, he accompanied his captors.

When he appeared below in the courtyard, a buzzing

Perspective Impressions

Some persons "view with alarm" a President who doesn't show his teeth.

Imagination has its highest use in a retrospective realization. Apparently the Hon. Francis J. Heney hasn't any.

An English publisher says there has been a decided slump in the quantity of American fiction. And yet our newspaper proprietors are constantly boosting their circulation.

The Grand Jury has been called upon to investigate the delinquencies of the Taylor dispensation. How tragic it would be to find the good, grey poet pleading for an immunity bath!

When last heard from the Hon. William J. Bryan was in Texas howling against "predatory wealth." Some day, it is to be hoped, an enterprising vaudeville manager will induce the Peerless One and the Mighty Hunter to "double up."

It is said that as the duty has been taken off art the country will be flooded with daubs and the public taste will be corrupted. This note of alarm implies the possibility of accomplishing the impossible. Public taste is conserved by the Sunday supplement.

"The Great American Novel" has again been written. It is called "A Certain Rich Man." As he has the merit of being entirely a fictitious personage Mr. John D. Rockefeller need have no hesitation in permitting the story to be read in the bosom of his family.

The Spectator

Beneficent Extravagance

Julius Caesar Saulmann, a civic patriot of the old school with no taste for the abstract but with an unquenchable passion for concrete examples of official turpitude, has been entertaining the Grand Jury with some choice extracts from current municipal history that serve to illustrate the generosity of our immaculate Mayor's official family. From Mr. Saulmann's researches it appears that there is something resembling a foundation for the rumors that persist with reference to the fine pickings enjoyed by certain landlords who have earned the esteem of our incorruptible officials. The city, Mr. Saulmann reports, is paying out $105,000 monthly in rentals which is just $84,000 a year more than it cost our indulgent taxpayers when the extravagant Mr. Ruef was taking care of our interests. With the money that we are paying out each year in rentals we could buy a pretty fine street structure large enough to house all our municipal departments. But let it not be supposed there is not a sound reason for what appears to be a crazy policy. We must remember that we are now governed by reformers sponsored by gentlemen who guarantee their own motives at frequent intervals. But to return to Mr. Saulmann. He reports that salaries have been raised in violation of the Charter, and he gives specific instances. He thinks the Grand Jury should rebuke our Mayor and Supervisors for their wanton disregard of the city's organic law, but it is unlikely that the matter will be deemed worthy of consideration. The Grand Jury is probably of the opinion that the Mayor and Supervisors should be indulged in their policy of extravagance since its object is to strengthen a political machine devoted to the greater good of the community.

Traps For Fickert

Running for District Attorney, Charley Fickert finds, is a sport that calls for as much alertness as he ever found it necessary to employ on the gridiron. He has been made painfully aware of the fact that his enemies have resolved not to scruple at means however foul to accomplish his defeat, and he has come to realize that since the introduction of those adventitious aids to political success which are peculiar to the gumshoe fraternity the ambition which he is indulging is fraught with the most unpleasant consequences. From the traps that have been set for him already it is clear that the most subtle ingenuity is to be exercised in the hope of overwhelming him with embarrassment. Several days ago he had an experience that would have been merely amusing had it not awakened a sense of the boldness and malevolence of the men who are intent upon his discomfiture. To his office came a man ostensibly for the purpose of employing an attorney. He explained that he wanted to incorporate a company and was prepared to pay $2,500 for legal services. Before revealing the character of the company he exhibited the coin. The company, he then explained, had been organized to engage in an immoral business. Fickert ordered the fellow out of his office. He afterwards learned that the man was a gumshoe artist.

"The Dead Calypso" Rewritten

Louis Alexander Robertson whose volumes of poetry, "The Dead Calypso," "Beyond the Requiems," "Cloistral Strains," "From Crypt and Choir" and "Through Painted Panes" have won him international recognition as a singer of true deep inspiration and of faultless technique, has prepared a revised version of "The Dead Calypso" which it is the privilege of Town Talk to present for the first time to the public. Appreciative readers of Robertson's poetry have long been divided into two parties, one acclaiming "Ataxia" as his greatest achievement, the other preferring "The Dead Calypso." The poet himself has always regarded the latter as the best of his poems. Like all sincere artists Robertson is an exacting technician and never so critical as when appraising his own work. He was never satisfied with "The Dead Calypso" in the form in which it appeared in two of his books and the discriminating yet enthusiastic praise of the foremost critics of this country and Great Britain has not sufficed to lull his dissatisfaction. Some time ago in the midst of mental and physical sufferings with which only his intimate friends can adequately sympathize, Robertson began the revision of his favorite work. Now that the poem, as he would have it endure, has been placed before his readers, opinion as to the propriety of his deletions, additions and alterations will undoubtedly be divided. He has changed a word here and a phrase there; in one place he has excised six verses, in another he has rewritten four and there are fourteen verses which were not in the original version.

Its Meaning Deepened

"The Death Calypso," in its original form was written about ten years ago and, as might be expected, there is something besides the Horatian limae labor, the labor of the file, in the new version. A subtle change has come over the spirit of Robertson's muse and has directed most of the alterations in the poem. It remains, of course, a monotone breathed by a lover over the dead body of a mistress, a transcendently beautiful palinode of passion; but the element of mysticism, only hinted at in the original, has been accentuated to such an extent that the poem carries a deeper significance than before. As an artist develops there comes a detachment from materiality or perhaps it would be more correct to say, a clothing of the material with the spiritual which inevitably makes for richer because more soul-satisfying achievement. That this has been the case with Robertson a comparison of the old and the new versions of "The Dead Calypso" will show.

From Lotus to Myrtle

The deeper note is struck delicately but, for all careful readers, decisively at the beginning of the poem:

Priestess of pleasure and love, thy lotus hath withered at last was the old reading of the second verse. But now the lotus has become the myrtle. That this is no light change the student of classical symbolism will readily perceive. In ancient architecture the lotus was continually employed because its wheel-like flower suggested perpetual cycles of existence; but it was also beloved of the sportive nymphs and the mythical effect wrought upon those who ate of it made it the symbol of tired, care-forgetting hedonism. The myrtle on the other hand was sacred to Venus; it was the meed of victors; and in its symbolical application to the rites of love the voluptuous suggestion was subordinated. For a priestess of pleasure the lotus would suffice, but for a priestness of pleasure and love the myrtle is the more appropriate emblem. The same ennobling of the theme has directed the change from "lust-loving lips" to "pale lethal lips." Only an unripe singer would prefer the former epithet. Similarly "vows meretricious" reads now "vows that enthralled me" and toward the close of the poem "fairest and frailest of women" has become "fairest of beautiful women."

A Stanza Left Out

What was formerly the fourth stanza of the poem has been dropped in the new version. It read as follows:

But when the pulses of youth throb with their eager insistence,
When the white snows of the heart melt with the breath of the spring,
Then when the currents of life leap with ineffable joyaunce,
Where is the hand that can point whither their waters will wend,
Whether through vistas of peace, on to Love's infinite ocean,
Or through dark devious ways, seeking the silt of the sewer.

There is a moralizing strain in these verses which Robertson may have regarded as discordant; certainly it does not appear elsewhere in the poem. The sacrifice of such beautiful lines, however much they may have seemed to interrupt the steady melancholy flow of the monotone, indicates the attitude of dispassionate detachment with which the poet has approached the task of remodelling his work. In the fourth stanza, the lines

Where through the darkness they dream, till the warm kiss of the morning,
Or the wild breath of the gale, drowns them in wave-woven foam have unquestionably been strengthened by change to the following which picture the fading of the stars before the dawn:

Where through the darkness they dream till the warm kisses of Eos
Woo them away from the waves back to their home in the skies.

Robertson and Swinburne

One alteration, although otherwise an improvement, has resulted rather awkardly in the repetition of a phrase, a slip which Robertson might easily have avoided.

Blind were their opaline orbs, on which I looked with amazement

now reads

Leaving their opaline orbs blind in the trance that enthralled them.

The words "vows that enthralled me" are to be found in the seventh stanza. The four last lines of the eighth stanza have been rewritten and the ninth, tenth and eleventh stanzas are entirely new. For purposes of comparison the old reading of the changed lines is given:

Night after night, though my fears, lulled by thy lips, fled like phantoms,
Soon every sigh that I heard seemed but a hiss from the grass;
Even thy sob of farewell stifled a laugh when I left thee
Coming at last, dear, to lay Love's chrismal lips on thy brow.

"The Dead Calypso" would bear comparison with Swinburne's "Laus Veneris." Robertson's verses sound darker depths of passion than those explored by the English master in his epoch-making poem; yet they are raised above the repellant sensuality of despair so insisted upon by Swinbure through the sublimating process worked out in the poet's mind and reflected in his poem, a process which has been the development of years.

Prisoner—I confess I embezzled from my partners, but I was always a hard worker. No one took more interest in the firm than I did.
Judge—Nor more capital. Four years!

The Campaign Opened

Breathing fire and brimstone on his critics, yapping and snapping with something of his old-time fervor, the Hon. Francis J. Heney opened his campaign at the Dreamland Pavilion last week. The opinion of non-partisan critics who attended the meeting out of curiosity is that the furious little prosecutor is no longer as stimulating as in the brave days of old. He bloviates with apparently as much enthusiasm as ever, he is still explosive and rambunctious, his flow of venom is still copious, but he has lost the power of holding his audience; his ravings, even when the realism of them is heightened by the veins in his forehead standing out like welts on a hide that has been flagellated, produce no affrighted faces to testify to his malign efficiency. The truth is that Mr. Heny, whose assaults and gibes but a year ago were listened to by the multitude with all their yawning ears, has lost his magnetism. The Heney of today is as distinct from the Heney of two years ago as a mountain is distinct from a turnip. At the Dreamland Pavilion many of his adherents found it difficult to pay deference to his theatric ecstasies or to yield emotion to his tempestuous appeals. Nobody was affrighted at the sinister possibilities that he contemplated. Several hundred people showed their bad taste by walking out in the midst of his diatribe and making so much noise as to distract those who wanted to hear what was being said. The exodus was worse than discouraging; it was pitiable.

An Appreciation

According to some of Mr. Heney's friends who have been apologizing for the Dreamland fizzle, he has been enervated by the wear and tear on his nerves during the strenuous crusade that he has been leading for the redemption of his beloved city. One of them solemnly explained to me the other day that that imponderable quality called magnetism abides with a man only while the vigor of body and mind is unimpaired. This unquestionably is true, and unquestionably Mr. Heney is far from being in the full vigor of his peculiar manhood, but not to this circumstance alone, in my opinion, is due his failure to fascinate his audience at the opening of his campaign. Though in court he certainly appears to have gone through a process of mental castration, on the platform he still abounds in the elements for which he was distinguished in the days when his harangues set men by the ears. His opening address was a bravura of bravado. He ran amuck with his old-time enthusiasm, with the ebullience of a bronco-buster shooting up the town. His vocabulary of invective has lost some of its pristine vigor, but his voice is as penetrating as ever in its stridency, and that he is in no wise hampered by scruples against imposing on the credulity of his audience I infer from his disingenuous offer to debate the questions at issue with Mr. Garret McEnerney. As Mr. William R. Hearst once said it would doubtless please Mr. Heney very much to have any respectable person debate with him. That was when Mr. Hearst thought that Mr. Heney should be in a pillory instead of on a platform. As to the little prosecutor's latest challenge the insincerity of it is evident from the fact that he very well knows that Mr. McEnerney is far away in Europe.

His Uneffectiveness

No, the Spreckels puppet has not suffered a diminution of his talent for titillating the lovers of scurrility and abuse, but that he has lost his effectiveness it would be absurd to deny. He has lost his effectiveness because he has lost the confidence of the people to whom he has been appealing. Even the incredibly credulous have begun to apprehend the imposture that has been practiced upon them. As they recall one by one the things that once were furiously denied, from the immunity contract to the golden inspiration from the Federal treasury and the Spreckels sack, things that are no longer matters of doubt; as they recall these things they marvel at their own stupidity and resent further overtures from the men they distrust. Hence the failure of Heney to electrify the Dreamland audience. Magnetism is a force that acts only upon receptive minds. The most magnetic of mummers cannot enthrall in a stupid play. Now Mr. Heney's play is played out. The people of San Francisco having been disillusioned Mr. Heney woos the caress of the fickle multitude in vain. His magnetism he wastes on the unpropitious air. There are discriminating dogs in the street that would scorn to preempt him for canicular convenience.

A Personal Note

Not to quit the unsavory topic abruptly, one word more touching Mr. Heney's desultory tribute of hostility to Town Talk. He would have the people believe that he has been libeled in the columns of this journal and that I am in danger of going to jail. Now despite the awful menace implied in his words the stream of life flows on with absolute tranquillity. I hope to be at liberty long after the name of Heney is embalmed in the hearty detestation of all honest men; but let it not be supposed that were Heney elected District Attorney I should be insensible to impending danger. I appreciate the fact that with Heney in control of the machinery of our criminal courts, with the vulgarly vindictive Spreckels at the helm of things, with unscrupulous detectives and conscienceless judges ready and willing to pack juries, it will not be impossible to send innocent men to jail. Heney certainly knows that he has never been slandered in Town Talk; that everything that has been said about him in these columns is susceptible of proof beyond peradventure of a doubt. Things that were said of him when proof would have been hard to obtain are now matters of common knowledge, and in fact no longer by himself denied. If ever I have been untruthful with reference to Mr. Heney it has not been by what I have published, but by my silence. "The cruellest lies," says Robert Louis Stevenson, "are often told in silence"; so, I will add, are the most charitable. As, to quote Stevenson further, a man may have sat in a room for hours and not opened his teeth and yet have come out of the room a vile calumniator, so may an editor prove himself a liar in the interest of a scoundrel by suppressing the truth. All Heney's infamies are not matters of record, nor have they been exploited in these columns. I have told lies in his behalf by holding my pen. For this I claim no credit. God forbid that I should tell the truth about Heney from any feeling of malignity. Vengeance as a mission is not a task for my hands. Besides I believe that the thunderbolts of retribution have long since been launched.

Ambitious Pinchot

According to one of the correspondents with the Taft party the President regards Forester Pinchot as a very zealous functionary deserving of encouragement so far as the duties of his office are concerned, but no further. I also learn that the Forester is ambitious of higher honors and at one time seriously regarded himself as qualified for a Cabinet position. The prospect of this honor being thrust upon him, however, is by no means imminent. From Washington comes the story that Mr.

Taft was amazed over Mr. Pinchot's attitude toward the lumber schedule of the tariff bill. Up to the time the consideration of the Payne bill was begun by the House Committee on Ways and Means Mr. Pinchot was generally set down as an advocate of free lumber. So lumbermen thought, and they argued with the Forester long and earnestly. Finally Mr. Pinchot came out in a letter in which he expressed the belief that he had been convinced that a tariff on lumber, instead of being hurtful, would in fact be helpful to the cause of forest conservation. He backed up this attitude in a personal appearance before the Ways and Means Committee. The statement is made that Mr. Pinchot took his position without conference with the President or any other leader of the Administration. Persons who followed the progress of the bill in committee say that had it not been for Mr. Pinchot's public stand favorable to a duty on lumber that product would have been on the free list of the Payne bill. Lumber was among the products that Mr. Taft sought to have admitted free. Some of his supporters declare that he would have won this point had it not been for what is characterized as "interference" on the part of Forester Pinchot.

GIFFORD PINCHOT

The millionaire head of the Forest Service whose enthusiasm in the cause of conservation has kept him much in the public eye.

The Pinchot Personality

Of the sincerity and earnestness of Gifford Pinchot there is not the slightest doubt. His enthusiasm about forest conservation amounts to fanaticism. He is a man with a mission, and he knows of nothing that approximates it in importance. Though a millionaire he has no taste for the frivolities of existence. He imbibed from his father a love of forest culture, and after graduating from Yale he went to Europe and spent several years in forest schools. On his return to this country he started a new profession, that of counsel for private owners of timber lands. He entered the public service in 1896 and when the Division of Forestry was established he became its chief clerk. It is said that the friendship between Roosevelt and Pinchot is closer than any other friendship the ex-President has. He is described by his admirers as a game and generous fighter for principle.

A Public Benefactor

My attention has been called to the fact that Forester Pinchot is somewhat illogical in his attitude of hostility toward the men engaged in the business of developing water power. He believes that timber is the great national resource to be husbanded. Nobody that appreciates the economic value of our forests and their essentiality in the scheme of things mundane doubts the soundness of this opinion. Now there is no better way of conserving our forests than discouraging the use of wood for fuel, and this is done by utilizing water power to generate electricity. Thus a double conservation is accomplished—of the forests and of the water used for power purposes. To develop water power satisfactorily the flow of water must be regulated, and to this end the snow in the mountains is conserved by means of snow fences designed to raise drifts and by dams. Furthermore the producers of water power as they provide a steady flow of water are benefactors of the farmer who uses the water to irrigate his land. They also render a service to navigation interests on our rivers by reason of the supply of water furnished during dry seasons. Thus they again benefit the farmer by enabling him to get his harvests to market. Indeed the farmer is in many ways the beneficiary of the power producer; not the least of the benefits which he enjoys being that of protection from flood waters that are impounded in the mountains. So it is evident that from more than one viewpoint the water power man is more deserving of encouragement than abuse. That he may increase and multiply should be the fervent wish of many of the farmers of California.

who has not either chained herself to the railing in Downing street or battered a policeman's helmet in front of the House of Lords is looked upon as a sincere advocate of the cause in the tight little island. Hostilities between glorious woman and mere man have not reached the stage of physical encounter in this backward region, but the precipitation of a passage-at-words with the Governor is an achievement in the sacred cause of which the local suffragist movement need not be ashamed. To be accurate, however, it was not the suffragist association which enticed the Governor into the tangled meshes of controversy; it was a single member of that body to whom the credit belongs. All honor to Mrs. Lillian Harris Coffin who has refused to be daunted by executive pronunciamento and sticks to her words as tenaciously as a British suffragette clings to a bobby's coat-tails. Personally I care not the value of a stuttering tinker's cuss-word whether it is Mrs. Coffin or the Governor whose recollection of the Santa Cruz incident is at fault. It may be that our honored executive, in the first flush of that interesting political victory in the beach town, allowed gallantry to gallop away with discretion and that he did actually promise to espouse the cause of equal suffrage. It may be too that in Sacramento during that tremendous governmental upheaval when Phil Stanton felt the ground slipping from beneath his feet, the Governor repudiated his hastily spoken words of Santa Cruz.

A Militant Suffragist

All this seems of little import to me except insofar as it illustrates the ugly snags that lie in wait to trip the dainty feet of women who attempt to invade politics. It is not a pretty game and I am sorry that so charming, so cultured and so wholesome a woman as Mrs. Coffin should insist upon playing it. I have followed Mrs. Coffin's activities in the cause of suffrage for some time and always with an admiring eye. I remember how admirably she bore herself last year when the Republican state convention in Oakland turned down her well- considered pleadings for a suffrage plank in the party instrument. I recall with what grace she showed her appreciation of the democrats at Stockton when they leaped eagerly at the opportunity to range so many influential and clever women on their side. But more particularly I watched Mrs. Coffin during the last legislature when she strove womanfully for the submission of the suffrage question to the popular vote. Mrs. Coffin has known the bitterness of defeat but it has neither ruffled her temper nor wrinkled her smiling brow. At times of course she has been compelled to assuage her indignation in public utterance. One such outburst has brought her into conflict with the Governor; another, not so long ago, in which she characterized some of our lawmakers as degenerates, left a sting that will not soon be forgotten. Degenerate is a harsh word and should be sparingly applied, but having noted the Lothario airs with which some of our senators approached Mrs. Coffin and other suffragists during the last spell of law-making, I am disposed to forgive her asperity. And while I wish no harm to Governor Gillett's political aspirations I hope that Mrs. Coffin will not come off second best in her latest set-to.

Overtures From Spreckels to Taft

It is not generally known that President Taft might have enjoyed during his brief sojourn in this city the hospitality of one of our most distinguished citizens. Long before he started from Washington he was made aware of the fact that it would give the Hon. Rudolph Spreckels pleasure beyond expression to entertain him in the beautiful and luxurious mansion in Van Ness avenue which was once the home of California's Sugar King. Of course Mr. Taft appreciated the warm and delicate sentiment betokened by Mr. Spreckels' solicitude for his comfort and welfare, but he intimated that there were many reasons of an official nature that constrained him to forego the pleasure of our aggressive young patriot's hospitality. Of course as Mr. Taft and Mr. Spreckels are not on terms of intimacy no formal invitation to the intellectual and other delights of the young millionaire's costly mansion was extended to the President, but he was urged with considerable eloquence to a receptive mood. How much he missed he will never know. Certainly had he taken up his headquarters in Van Ness avenue he would have been regaled sumptuously on the details of the local imbroglio, and doubtless he would have been introduced to many zealous and disinterested uplifters who would have generously inferred for their own virtuous purposes, and given publicity to the inference, that the President had conspicuously favored them with a mark of his esteem and given their somewhat frayed and dilapidated cause his hearty moral support. As it was the President conducted himself as though entirely ignorant of the squabbles of the parish. To be sure he knows all about them, for have they not been the subject of discussion in Congress? His silence was therefore pregnant with significance. In all the circumstances it is natural to conclude that among our uplifters there is keen disappointment. Indeed, the vicious assault that was recently made on President Taft at a public meeting by one of Rudolph Spreckels' kept pettifoggers, has given me the

Judge Murasky as an Auctioneer

For two reasons the sale by auction of the posters contributed by the newspaper artists for the Youths' Directory vaudeville at the St. Francis last week was distinctly disappointing. In the first place the prices at which the posters were "knocked down" were ridiculously beneath the intrinsic worth of the pictures which showed some of our cleverest illustrators at their happiest. Virgil Nahl's fine poster which was reproduced in Town Talk last week brought only $25 while the drawings by Rogers, Coleman, Terry, Sparks, McNeil and others went for five and ten dollars apiece. I am loth to admit that there was no artistic appreciation in the throng which gathered in the colonial ball room; in fact I know that there were many in the assemblage who possessed critical discrimination in the appraisement of artistic efforts. Just as little do I care to acknowledge that the purse strings of our prominent men and women are ever held taut in the presence of charitable appeal. So I am forced to account otherwise for the miserable prices placed upon these works of art, and this brings me to the second reason why the auction proved disappointing. I am afraid it must be set down that Judge Murasky is an unsuccessful auctioneer. That his heart was full of his subject I know, for Judge Murasky, as the presiding officer of the juvenile court, takes a deep and continuous interest in the welfare of homeless youngsters. But there was an excess of judicial calm in his honor's conduct of the auction; in his hands it was a solemn function instead of an interlude of gaiety spiced with personal quip and pat allusion. Judge Murasky failed to move his auditors and I take it that the magnetic current of good humor and jolly rivalry has as much to do with the depleting of a fat pocketbook at a charitable auction as any other form of cajolery. Too bad, for the sake of Father Crowley and the charitable artists, that Judge Murasky did not approach his part in a more hilarious spirit.

The President at the Press Club

Those who had the good fortune to penetrate the sanctum of newspaper leisure on the occasion of Taft's visit probably gained a happier estimate of our chief executive than those who heard him speak at the Union League Club or the Fairmont. The reception at the Union League Club and the big banquet were made the occasions for a deal of oratory of the ponderous sort and the President was constrained to reply in kind. Hence his utterances were interesting and important as expressions of governmental policy but lacking in the personal note which alone warms the cockles of the heart and reveals character. But at the Press Club it was very different. The President came late and the newspapermen, realizing that he was fatigued and having little patience with mere orators, simply elected him to honorary membership and then sat back and listened to as gracefully appreciative and witty a heart-to-heart talk as the President ever made. He told of his own early newspaper experience in Cincinnati, of his hunt for human interest stories at the only political convention he ever attended, and paid his respects, first in terms of drollery and afterwards of sincere compliment, to the Washington correspondents who haunt him in his comings and goings by day and night. His clever sallies evoked peal after peal of laughter and his statement that the local press club was the most luxuriously housed that he had ever entered was duly applauded. It was the real Taft whom the newspapermen were privileged to meet and his visit will be remembered as one of the pleasantest incidents of the club's history. It was expected that the correspondents who have accompanied Taft on his trip would visit the club when their night's labor was finished but either the lure of Morpheus or the thrall of the lights that twinkle along the beach kept them away. Nevertheless the jinks brilliantly sired by "Billy" Barnes kept morning at bay without them.

DOMESTIC DUTIES OF THE ESKIMO WOMAN

Eskimo girls marry at the early age of fourteen, without wedding ceremony, and young couples frequently change partners. As might be expected the Eskimo housewife is an expert in the preparation of fish; but it may surprise many to learn that she does the fishing for the family. Her lord and master is not averse from allowing her to engage in other menial labors. The Eskimos who are very much in the public eye just now, are thought to be the remnants of an ancient Siberian tribe, many of them being of a strikingly Mongolian type. They are simple, humorous and honest, generous and hospitable, ignorant and dirty, but very inquisitive and imitative. That they cultivated the sweet tooth was not generally known until Dr. Cook told of his famous barrel of gum drops.

of the art room of the New York Herald and has made such big strides in portrait painting during the past few years that he has commanded the approbation of the best metropolitan critics. Many prominent people all over the world have sat for him. He comes to this city with letters from J. O'Hara Cosgrave, the brilliant San Franciscan who is editing Everybody's with such conspicuous ability. The Funk exhibition started too late for extended notice in this week's issue but those who have had a private view of some of the canvasses are enthusiastic about the artistic powers of the painter.

The Resignation of William Winter

After having served for forty-four years as dramatic critic of the New York Tribune William Winter, the dean of that particular branch of newspaper work in America, has resigned his post in consequence of a row which is not quite so extraordinary as some chroniclers of the circumstances would have us believe but which is intensely interesting, nevertheless. Other dramatic critics of less fame than Winter have encountered the same difficulties in the wielding of an independent pen and although neither their position nor their abilities have won for them the widespread notice which has been bestowed upon the Winter-Tribune imbroglio, it must be noted that their cause has sometimes possessed more merit. William Winter's glory will always be that his writings upheld the purity of the drama; that they lashed the immoral and the lascivious in theatrical entertainments with dauntless disregard of consequences; and that their critical content was never affected by mercenary considerations. But Winter is a very old man and although he has always denied indignantly that he reverenced that which was old, simply because it was old and that he judged the present by the standards of the past, there remains a great deal of truth in these assertions. For Winter the present is decadent; he is fond of denouncing the "animalism in current literature," the "cynicism in contemporary thought" and the "admired publicity of degenerate authors." That some of these denunciations have had ample justification cannot be denied but Winter has indulged in them for many years with the gusto of a crank riding a hobby and many of his animadversions have very properly been discounted and repudiated.

The Sanctum Controversy

For two years there has been friction between the dramatic critic and the managing editor of the Tribune and the climax came recently when that newspaper refused to print certain invective articles attacking Abraham Erlanger and the theatrical trust. That the newspaper was not entirely in the wrong is apparant from some of the passages which were deleted from Winter's articles. There were brutal references to the Jewish descent of the managers whom Winter disliked and there was a poem entitled "Processional" enlarging on the same theme which no newspaper of general circulation would have had the hardihood to publish. After the blue pencil had done its work Winter wrote to the managing editor of the Tribune in explanation of his course. "My articles relative to indecent and therefore reprehensible plays," he said, "have been and are framed for the purpose of doing as much injury to the business of persons exploiting them as possible; of informing respectable persons of what is going on in the theatre and of keeping as many readers as possible away from obnoxious and injurious plays." To this the managing editor made answer: "Your policy of placing on the Sunday theatrical page, beside our theatrical advertising, matter 'framed for the purpose of doing as much injury as possible to the business' of some of our advertisers, may or may not be the right one, and the publication of such articles may or may not be the duty of the journalist to society. I do not attempt to decide the question. All I say is that my instructions with regard to that page are that the articles are not to be framed with any such purpose, and the excisions which I made were in strict and necessary accordance with those instructions. That a play is well attendd, that there has or has not been a change in the cast, etc., etc.—these are facts which can properly be stated, whether the play is good or bad, and the paper does not demean itself or do an injustice to its readers when it records them, and does no more."

Winter's Peppery Retort

This letter enunciated a policy with regard to the Sunday notices of plays, as distinguished from the criticisms which appear on the morning following the opening night, which obtains in newspaper offices all over the country; but when the editor sought to justify his course by reference to the advertisers, he placed himself in a hopeless position, so far as Winter was concerned. Any dramatic critic of high standing from whom the writing of such Sunday notices was expected would have resented such an argument and William Winter showed his indignation in a fiery reply. "I am not a reporter," he retorted; "that is one of the reasons why I declined to write such notices. I told you then and I repeat now that it is my explicit belief that plays of the kind specified by me should never be mentioned except in condemnation and in such a way as will arouse and stimulate public contempt for persons who are responsible for their production. In my judgment the Tribune does demean itself whenever it mentions such plays or their producers in any other spirit. I have never questioned your technical right to cut or reject any or all writing offered by me to the Tribune. To allow me freedom of expression on week days when the circulation of the Tribune is small and to forbid anything condemnatory on the Sunday page when the circulation is much larger, marked a vital change in policy and practically took the dramatic department out of my hands. The one thing I now regret is that I did not resign my position instantly upon receipt of your letter." There are many angles to the controversy which has been precipitated by this correspondence and the consequent resignation of Winter. On one of them San Francisco has had considerable light within the past few weeks. When the critics of the daily press united in the fiercest sort of denunciation of "The Girl from Rector's," even inciting the police department to the exercise of censorship, it is no secret that their virtuous activities packed the theatre for the rest of the week. It was not until thousands in quest of salacity had seen the play and had spread the report of its yawn-compelling stupidity that the box office ceased to be besieged. During the second week it played to very small audiences.

A Monk's Passion Play

A passion play, the work of a local playwright, is to be produced by local talent in this city next week. Next week's production is to be the first, and yet this play is already described as "America's Great Passion Play," and we are told that it is "an inspiring drama" and that it is to be produced decennially. All this may be quite true, but is it not also somewhat premature? How nearly the work approximates greatness as a playable drama we are yet to see; how inspiring it is as a moving, visible performance nobody has yet had the privilege of judging; and as it is among the possibilities that it may prove uninspiring and tedious who can truthfully assert that the first performance will ever be repeated? Let it not be supposed that I am at all skeptical as to the genius of Father Josaphat Kraus of the Franciscan Order, the author of this new passion play. Of his ability as a playwright I have not the slightest knowledge. I sincerely hope that he has constructed a dramatic masterpiece, and as I assume that he is a man of intelligence I am sure that he will not be offended that I have marveled at the assurance of the men who have been promoting publicity with a view to the filling of the Baker street Coliseum next week. If all that these men tell us is true then the birth of this passion play has been attended by phenomena bordering on the miraculous. For example they tell us that theatrical managers all over the country have been applying to Father Josaphat for rights of production. This is probably the first time in the history of the drama that theatrical managers have thus besieged an unknown playwright in advance of the presentation of his maiden effort. They also tell us that moving picture concerns have already offered thousands of dollars—how many thousands they do not specify—for the privilege of reproducing scenes from the play on their films. Yet such pictures will be of no value if the play is not a great success. However, the probability is that the pictures will be beautiful, for pictorially, we are told, the production is to be superb, a celebrated scenic artist having been brought from London to attend to the details of this feature. That it will be altogether a sumptuous production is likely, since expense has not been spared on the accessories. Father Josaphat, it should be stated, is a modest monk, who had no thought of an elaborate production of his play when he was writing it, his intention being to have the performance in the little auditorium of the church of St. Boniface.

The Bal Bullier

The news comes from Paris that the hall in which the annual Students' Ball was held is no more. It has been torn down to make room for a department store. Whether the Bal Bullier will seem the same in another setting remains to be seen. It was at the ball in the Grand Boulevard that the students abandoned themselves to the cancan and other wild frolics, but did it with such boldness and originality that as a spectacle alone it commanded admiration. It was one of the things to be disapproved on general principles, but which the most correct witnessed and enjoyed. There was nothing like it in Paris. Viewed wholly as an art production it was well worth a visit, and because of that quality it thrived by the patronage of persons who would have tired of mere effrontery. Its designers called it a saturnalia, a feast of joy, beauty and equality and a return of the golden age. That was as good a description as any, for the happiest as well as the boldest inspirations found embodiment there, and questions of expense never needed to be considered. The entire Latin Quarter stood to back the affair to any amount required for an adequate artistic setting, and everybody there cherished it as one of the dearest institutions in that classic section of the city. At some of these balls the eyes of the spectators were filled with the marvelous spectacle furnished by from 2,500 to 3,000 costumes, each of which had been for weeks the preoccupation of artists trained to assemble colors, to drape fabrics and to study characters of historic epochs. But costumes, however rich, were not to be compared to nature's fabric as revealed in the flesh tints of the young models. After the initial procession, which was marched in orderly fashion as became a specacle on which so much care had been expended, the proceedings grew rapidly less formal and high kickers, grotesque and eccentrics engaged in tireless, endless carnival. Americans took to it because it was odd and bold and original, and it is safe to say that in its heyday it proved as much of an attraction for American men as for sweethearts and wives. The visit was an experience for the average American woman and she usually was glad to have had it.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy.

Local Securities: A new era was started in California security dealings when, on October 1, the common and preferred stocks and the 5 per cent gold bonds of the Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Company were formally listed on the New York Stock Exchange. This event was a signal for a big boom, especially in the common stock, and a rise of over $20 in it was the result. The preferred stock made a gain of over $5 in New York. Our local market for Telephone stocks has naturally been affected by the forward movement in the east, but we have been on the average of about two points below the New York market. This difference has been caused by the fact that all trades from here on the eastern market have to be either seller 5 days or buyer 5 days, as the case may be. Pacific Gas and Electric stocks have fallen behind in point of activity, though at this writing the demand from New York for them appears to be assuming greater proportions. Alaska Packers has had some excellent buying for the past week or so and has shown a steady increase in price. Spring Valley Water has also been in demand and it is rumored that this company will increase dividends before the first of the year. Hawaiian sugar stocks are not active at present because this time of year is between seasons. But an extra dividend of 50 cents per share on Hawaiian Commercial awakened some little interest. The stock of the California Wine Association has had a serious setback and at the request of the Association has been removed temporarily from the list. It is said that there is an assessment announcment coming out on these shares. The week's trading in bonds has been of more than the usual size and demonstrates clearly that there is a large amount of outside capital seeking investment in California's offerings. I believe that local interests have been the chief sellers. Southern California securities have played no small part in the local bond dealings, and Pacific Electric Railway 5s, Los Angeles Gas and Electric 5s, Los Angeles Lighting 5s and Los Angeles Pacific 5s have all started toward higher prices. United Railroads 4s, Pacific Telephone 5s and California Gas and Electric 5s have been the most active of our home bonds. I would advise that extreme caution be exercised in dealing in Pacific Telephone common as a decided setback is likely to occur at any time. For those holders who have their stock at substantially cheaper prices I think that this is a royal time to take profits. The advance in the preferred stock is merited and I think that there are still several points profit to be made on the buying side of it. Pacific Gas and Electric, common and preferred, and Alaska Packers continue to impress me as excellent purchases.

Eastern Securities: Wall Street Securities continue to show remarkable strength in the face of threatened hardening of interest rates, though the actual money conditions are less stringent than expected. The strength in Steel stocks has overshadowed all other features of the market. It is a foregone conclusion that the next dividend on steel common will be four per cent to be followed by a raise to six per cent. The earnings of the Geary Plant has so far exceeded the expectations of insiders that the officers of the company are fairly carried off their feet. The Metal stocks are acting well, and a good advance may be looked for in Amalgamated Copper soon. The tip is again going the rounds to buy Katy Common for an advance, also to buy Denver and Rio Grande Common and Preferred in anticipation of the early completion of the Western Pacific. The Hill Securities should be purchased on any fair decline; this also applies to St. Paul and Rock Island. It is given out from good quarters that the Steel stocks will be listed in Paris during the present month and that then Steel Common will sell at 115. There is a strong tip out on Republic Steel and Iron coming as it does from the buyers of these securities 20 to 30 points lower they may be trying to open a bag for some one to hold. A cautious position for the present seems best.

Cotton: The week has been fraught with intense interest and uncertainties. The market has broken into new high ground, and in fact has reached levels not attained at this season of the year since the Civil War. Prevailing conditions undoubtedly favor the market. An immense public following has been drawn to the bull side and so industrously has information concerning the crop been spread about that the opinion is practically universal that some time during the season much higher prices will be seen. This is an important sentimental asset. So far the spots demand has been very keen and factors and cotton holders have been able to fix prices for their cotton and enforce their demands. Simultaneously the stock of old cotton in Liverpool has been rapidly passing from the hands of importers to spinners. Liverpool stocks which have gone a long ways toward swelling the supply are thus being reduced and the takings from that market each week are tending to keep down the increase in the visible and to offset the accumulations at American centers from the large movement of new cotton now under way. There has developed a large short interest in actual cotton for early October shipment, and an interest of this kind is always bullish help, as the short buyer does not stand back on price when the time comes to fill his contract. In addition to the public speculation the market is being supported by wealthy people who are not usual traders in cotton, but having made money in wheat are enamored of cotton because it appears that conditions in the staple are similar to those which made the wheat deal successful—namely, a supply below what the world may normally be assumed to want. James A. Patten is the chief of these, and though at the first of the week he left New York he publicly declared that he was still long of cotton and believed in 17 cents. Patten has not heretofore in his speculative history given out misleading newspaper interviews. Mr. Patten's theory is that the supply is so small that in the end the spinners will buy it and use it at a price above where he purchased it and that he will find a natural market for his holdings regardless of public participation in the speculation. The final crop condition report issued by the Government on Monday of 58.5 indicates a crop of less than 11,000,000 bales. The total amount of cotton ginned to September 25 as reported by the Census bureau on Monday was 2,565,888 bales against 2,582,688 last year and 1,532,602 in 1907. Both reports fell flat but the Census report owing to the heavy ginnings reported is expected to cause some liquidation in the next few days. However we favor buying on all recessions irrespective of the construction that may be placed on the Census report.

Grain: The scalping position in wheat has continued. Unexpectedly the September delivery closed with a bear panic, the price jumping from 14 cents to $1.20 in the last hours. The short interest was about 2,000,000 the last day and 1,200,000 was at the mercy of the market, 800,000 bushels were delivered. There was no large short committments, the amount being scattered among one hundred or more brokers. The incident had no permanent effect on the market. The receipts continue to rule the market and will do so, we are on an entirely domestic situation with farmers slow to sell spring wheat at a price five cents below a year ago. The milling demand is being satisfied slowly, and spring stocks are accumulating. Buyers are buying with conservatism and when able to hedge on the market. The larger receipts at Duluth over Minneapolis represents durum for which domestic demand is slow, and prices on an entirely different basis than regular wheat. The smaller receipts on the larger special crop is to some extent due to the smaller durum yield. At the present rate it will take a month for northwestern supplies to reach a comfortable position and make the trade feel free of a shortage contingency. The only course to pursue in wheat is to sell on large daily receipts and buy on a small scale. The market is now over 7 cents over Liverpool and with our surplus the parity will be reached.

Miasma

In the swailful swirl of the soughful wind, as the gust goes glooring by, I sit by the bole of a baneful borch, with a moan and a soulful sigh. The mellowing mists of the eye are low, and the frog in the dankful marsh chirps chirpingly sad in the ghoulsome gloom, in a swivering voice and harsh:

"Oh, where is the swing of the swoonful swish,
And the voice of the flam-flam foul?
Methinks it moans from the murky mould,
And the home of the hootful owl."

Now, swivel me swift from the surging spring; I'm weary of wold and wind. The grewsome graik of the jobberwock comes jimmering to my mind. The feeble song of the sportsome frog comes solemnwise soughing slow, and again I hear by the bournful birch the wait of his wimpled woe:

"Oh, where is the swing of the swoonful swish,
From the land of the springful sprole?
Must the blue mists blur on the drinkful drale,
And freight with their frought my soul?"

Freddie Greenwood on the Verge

When a confirmed bachelor shows signs of forsaking the easy life of clubs for the stern responsibilities of the married state, everybody sits up and takes wondering notice. I have been given to understand that this attitude of amazement will soon be the correct manner of regarding Fred Greenwood, for out of the north there comes a little bird whispering to me that this popular young man has been snared at last. The soft tale has to do with a very beautiful young lady of Portland whose name I am not privileged to divulge just yet and until I am allowed to give further particulars gossip must content itself with exclamations of surprise over the unexpectedness of it all. Freddie Greenwood is one of the best known bachelors in town and although he has not yet attained the years at which bachelordom is considered an unchangeable habit, there are few who will not arch their brows to learn that he contemplates matrimony.

Our Rival Leaders

Again we are told that Mrs. Alexander is intent upon snatching the scepter from the perennial Greenway. Not a word of truth in it. Mrs. Alexander's only purpose is to contribute to the mild relaxations of the fashionable herd. Agreeing with Byron that society is "one polished horde, formed of two mighty tribes, the bores and bored" she is animated by the beneficent purpose of alleviating the tedium of existence in Burlingame and wherever the atmosphere is charged with the stifling emanations of minds that have been educated down to the level of the tragic elect who are ambitious of exclusiveness. Mrs. Alexander has no thought of entering into competition with the magnetic and talented Mr. Greenway. She knows that he is the irremovable pastor of the Burlingame parish, the high and puissant prince of all our provincial aristocracy. She has no hostility to Mr. Greenway. She admires him for his pliancy, his gentleness, his perfect manners, his wit and his vivacity. As for Greenway he is far from being in panic state over the prospect depicted by the unreliable dailies.

MISS EDITH PAGE

Whose engagement to James T. Van Loben Sels has been announced.

He moves as ever in an ethereal atmosphere, feeding full of the food of the gods, and discussing with the air of a philosopher the merits and demerits of remote and of recent vintages. The literature of wine is Mr. Greenway's staple mental diet, and he can expatiate on it eloquently. Most other subjects he eschews. He is not on unfriendly terms with Mrs. Alexander, but of course she will not serve his wine at her St. Francis supper. It is only on the question of brand that they are irreconcilable. Women at the Taft Banquet

The appearance of beautiful women in handsome gowns standing on chairs to get a view of the President and hear him speak, added an unusual touch of informality to the Taft banquet at the Fairmont. The ladies had been attending various functions and their curiosity or patriotism, or what you will just wouldn't let them stay away from the sacred precincts of the banquet room. Little Mrs. Vincent Whitney who was entertaining guests at dinner led the way and in a few minutes one end of the banquet hall was crowded with women. Mrs. Whitney, attired in a most artistic dress of gray silk net embroidered in gray silk looked very picturesque on her perch. She wore a most original hat made of silver cloth with a felt facing, the brim encircled with emerald green plumes. Anna Peters also attracted attention. Her immense long ear rings were startling. Her dress was a fluffy pale pink chiffon made with deep tunic, and the hat was an enormous affair of black beaver covered with plumes. It was noticeable that most of the new evening hats were black. Another group of handsomely attired women was with Mrs. Marshall Hale. Mrs. Gavin McNab, Mrs. Edward Robeson Taylor, Mrs. Andrew M. Davis, Mrs. Eberle and Miss McNab, the latter looking particularly pretty in a gown of yellow brocaded chiffon with bows of black velvet, and Mrs. Henry Payot, wearing a quantity of rose point, kept applauding all evening. Mrs. Florence Porter Pfingst who gave a pretty little dinner in honor of Mrs. James N. Gillett, looked very pretty in a gown of gray satin made with a long sweeping full train, with the bodice close fitting and quite covered with embroidery. Mrs. Edgar Judson Benedict wore a Parisian gown of an odd color of grayish blue green moire.

Miss Calhoun's Rumored Engagement

It may be that the intimacy which exists between the Calhouns and the Fosters of San Rafael is responsible for the story and then again there may be more solid basis for the very interesting rumor, but whether true or false, certain it is that tea-table whisperings connect the names of Miss Margaret Calhoun and Paul Foster, son of A. W. Foster, in prophecies of a soon-to-be-announced engagement. The Calhoun family and the Fosters are much together and Miss Margaret Calhoun is a particular chum of Miss Louisiana Foster. When the Calhouns went to the Yellowstone recently Miss Foster accompanied them and the two girls spend much time together in San Rafael. It may be that this camaraderie has given rise to the interesting tale which involves Paul, but there are wise ones close to the two families who think there is more than that in the rumor.

Miss Cowles Said To Be Engaged

Signs occasionally fail but if a pretty girl receives an enormous box of orchids every blessed day, with box parties at the theatres and all sorts of conspicuous public attentions from a chap who cannot mask his eyes to hide the adoration he feels in his heart, is not one justified in drawing conclusions? That is what Miss Cecil Cowles' friends are asking. In fact, at tea at the Fairmont the other afternoon one brave girl put the query point-blank but pretty Cecil merely blushed and referred the curious one to her mother. Mrs. Cowles is taciturn but the rumor refuses to be snubbed to silence. Miss Cowles' chums declare that a handsome trouseau is in preparation and the only thing they regret is that her future residence may be in New York where the family of her generous suitor resides.

Well-Known Matron Dies Suddenly

Friends of Mr. and Mrs. Willis Davis were shocked to learn that Mrs. Davis was stricken with paralysis soon after her recent arrival in Boston and the news of her death has been received with general sorrow. Mr. and Mrs. Davis left this city for the east last week and on arriving in Boston took quarters at the Hotel Touraine where they were to await the arrival of their daughter Miss Sidney Davis who was to accompany them on a lengthy tour abroad for the benefit of Mr. Davis' health. Telegrams to friends in this city at first reported Mrs. Davis in a serious condition but did not prepare them for her sudden passing. Mrs. Davis was Miss Kohler, daughter of Mrs. Charles Kohler of Stockton and niece of Mrs. Anna L. Bauer of this city. Her eldest daughter Edna surprised society last winter by eloping with Pierre Moore.

Miss King Joins Christian Science

Miss Genevieve King has caused a flutter among her friends by embracing Christian Science. I am told that she arose at a meeting recently and gave a demonstration, as it is called, describing her ailment and testifying to the beneficial results which had followed the application of Christian Science methods. That demonstration is talked of as one of the biggest shocks to conventionality administered in a long time.

Death Casts Gloom Over Society

The tragic ending of Sidney B. Cushing has cast a gloom over society in this city and San Rafael where the family is well known. Mrs. Cushing was formerly Grace Eldridge, daughter of the late I. O. Eldridge, prominent for many years as a real estate dealer. Miss Dollie Eldridge married Charles Green, now of San Mateo. Mrs. Cushing and Mrs. Green were well known in the Rincon Hill and South Park set in years gone by. On account of the death of her father Miss Dollie Cushing will not be one of the bridesmaids at the wedding of her friend Miss Helen Baker and Drummond MacGavin and her own wedding to James Jenkins, nephew of Mrs. Edwin L. Griffiths of Ross Valley, will be postponed until next year. Mrs. Cushing is a prominent member of the Francisca Club and out of respect for her bereavement the many brilliant luncheons which had been planned for the opening day did not take place. Mrs. Cushing sent a personal request that the formality of the opening should not be interfered with but the club directors decided otherwise. The club's housewarming will take place later.

Richly Furnished Women's Clubs

What impresses one particularly about the new home of the Francisca Club is the lavishness of its furnishings. It breathes of wealth. It is all in the modern style, of no particular period and with no particular coherence in the relation of one room to another. The living room is heavily beamed in dark wood and the hard-wood floor is scattered with elegant rugs. The dining room in ivory white suggests colonial simplicity. The library with its well-filled shelves is the best room in the club. It is done in dull mahogany. Numerous card rooms, all light and airy, afford ample facilities for the favorite pastime of the Franciscans. The new Town and Country Club is in every way different from the Francisca. All is reposeful and unobstrusively elegant with no more suggestion of cost than one would find in a beautiful garden. Soft grays predominate, the tapestries and woodwork being in restful though warmly tinted tones. The library table is unique, having been brought from a ruined monastery in Brittany. It is of iron oak, grayish brown and exquisitely carved. Once the monks gathered around it to read their breviaries but now dainty silks frou-frou against its carved sides and it is pressed by feminine elbows—a change so startling that it suggests all sort of bromidic reflections which I shall considerately repress.

EVERY WOMAN

Covets a fresh, smooth, satiny complexion, and what satisfaction and peace of mind its possession brings. The lines of age, worry and overwork are rendered well nigh powerless by Mrs. Nettie HARRISON'S LOLA MONTEZ CREME. A wonderful soother, healer and protector to a dry, contracted or chapped skin. It is Complexion Insurance. A Jar (3 months' treatment) 75 cents at all Druggists. To convince you of its remarkable power, I will send a free sample and "Beauty Book" on request. Mrs. NETTIE HARRISON, San Francisco.

Writers' Days

Following out a policy beginning with the new club year the Pacific Coast Women's Press Association will devote its social days to the work of its prominent writers. The first member to receive this honor was Mrs. Ella M. Sexton, a woman of delightful personality and a writer of more than ordinary ability. Her poems, short stories and one-act farces have a very just claim for recognition. Next Monday, the second of these writers' days, will be devoted to the exploitation of Mrs. Frona Waite Colburn, the first woman to engage in daily newspaper work in this city. Mrs. Colburn began her journalistic career on the Examiner in the eighties, before William R. Hearst emerged from college. She did some important and brilliant work for that paper. In later years she has been a very active woman. In 1890 she was made special agent of the Bureau of Labor statistics. It was she that conceived the Eucalyptus motif in art which our local artists have made so much of. She has written a prehistoric romance entitled "Germah the Dorado" and a book of Indian Messiac Myths, besides lecturing in all the large cities of the United States. She has done much for California wines at several national expositions where she exploited their merits. During the present year she has been engaged in editorial work on financal papers. A versatile and energetic woman is Mrs. Colburn and deserving of the tribute to be paid here by the Press Association.

Jimmy Redpath, Carpenter

Popular Jimmy Redpath whose duty it is to keep the newspapermen informed of so much and no more of Southern Pacific doings as it is deemed expedient to make public, boasts an unusual accomplishment. For the past three years he has devoted his spare hours to the building of a bungalow in San Anselmo and the result now stands revealed in as cosy a six-room habitation as was ever reared by the labor of one man. It is all his own work for he has allowed nobody to help him in swinging the hammer and buzzing the saw which performed the miracle. The bungalow has a veranda on three sides, a great living room with a big fire place, hardwood floors, beamed ceilings and all the conveniences that spell home. Redpath knew nothing about building when he started, but he went to work with scientific ardor fortifying his ambition with all the books that he could lay his hands on. Now the bungalow is the pet of San Anselmo and all the friends of Mr. and Mrs. Redpath are eagerly awaiting invitations to the housewarming.

Darrach Goes East

The dinner given on Thursday night by the members of the Bohemian Club in honor of Marshall Darrach of New York was a mark of esteem and good fellowship and an appreciative recognition of the place he occupies among the literary men of the country. His artistic interpretation of Shakespeare's plays proclaims a scholarly attainment rare even among university men and his impersonation of the characters shows marvelous versatility and skill. Society and clubdom have been intensely interested in him during his stay here and on his return from New York in March prior to his departure for a tour of the world he and Dr. Humphrey Stewart, the well known local composer, have planned to give a series of recitals which will inaugurate an art form new here but very popular in New York. The plays selected for presentation are "A Midsummer Night's Dream" with one hundred and fifty selected voices and fifty trained musicians rendering the music by Mendlessohn,

"The Tempest" with the music by Sir Arthur Sullivan and additional songs and choruses from classical sources, and "Macbeth," the music especially arranged from the orchestral score of Edgar Stillman Kelley and some original effects written for the occasion by Dr. Stewart. Mr. Darrach left Friday for New York after having spent most of the summer here and in Honolulu.

Two Popular Girls Engaged

Society on both sides of the bay was deeply interested in the announcement of the engagement of Miss Edith Page, daughter of the late Wilfred Page, and James T. Van Loben Sels which was made public lately at a bridge party given by the prospective bride at the residence of her mother in Berkeley. Miss Page comes from a prominent and well known family. Mrs. Horace Hellmann and Mrs. J. W. Mailliard are her aunts. Miss Leslie Page and Miss Anita Mailliard, two of the most beautiful and attractive young girls of the ultra smart set, are her cousins. Mrs. Page, the bride's mother, was a Miss Adams, one of the noted beauties of the early day exclusive set. Mr. Van Loben Sels is a son of the former Consul of Holland and is prominent in the social and business world. He is a relative of the de Fremerys of Oakland. The date of the wedding is set for December. At a daintily appointed luncheon given in honor of Miss Jean Tyson, Miss Avis Sherwood of Oakland announced her engagement to Arthur L. Doremus of New York. Miss Sherwood is the attractive daughter of Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Sherwood and grand daughter of Mrs. Robert Sherwood. Her mother was Miss Warner, an eastern girl who met and became engaged to H. H. Sherwood while he was attending Harvard. Miss Dorothy Chapman is a cousin of the prospective bride. These two charming girls made their debut last year at a ball given by their grandmother. Miss Sherwood is tall and graceful and a decided brunette. She has traveled extensively and is noted for her beautiful voice which was cultivated abroad. The wedding will take place in the spring. The future home of the young couple will be New Jersey where her fiance is a prominent business man.

Departure of Mrs. Hickox

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Hickox of Cleveland, Ohio, who have been visiting relatives in this city for the past three weeks left Monday evening for home by way of Seattle. During their visit here they were extensively entertained. One of the most elaborate luncheons of the past week given in honor of Mrs. Hickox was that of Mrs. Patrick Calhoun at her home in Webster street. Among the guests were Mrs. George Page, Mrs. Beverly MacMonagle, Mrs. Norman McLaren, Mrs. Addison, Mrs. C. P. Pomeroy, Mrs. Robert Chester Foute and Mrs. Chrystal Harrison. The costumes of Mrs. Hickox were certainly the most elaborate seen here in many a day. Her evening robes in particular were works of art. Mr. Hickox is many times a millionaire and nothing, I am told, gives him more happiness than seeing his beautiful wife appear in her gorgeous imported costumes resplendent with exquisite jewels. Mrs. Hickox was Miss Alice Chrystal before her marriage to the late Henry B. Havens, a member of the prominent Oakland family.

Paymaster Greer to Retire

Apropos the Greer-Wilson wedding which was the most brilliant social event of last week, gossip has it that the groom is going to retire from the navy. It is said that Mr. and Mrs. John Scott Wilson, the parents of the bride, while otherwise giving hearty approval to the match, have expressed their disapproval of the navy career for their son-in-law and that Paymaster Greer made a promise that he would retire before the parental benediction was pronounced upon the engagement.

Miss Richards and Other Buds

One of the handsomest of the private balls to be given during the earlier season will be at the old Henry E. Huntington home in Jackson street, this property having been recently acquired by Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Bancroft who are making elaborate plans for the coming-out party of their beautiful granddaughter, Miss Ruth Richards, the daughter of the C. O. Richards of Southern California. Miss Richards is a girl of unusual distinction of appearance, tall, aristocratic in manners and looks, and blessed with a lovable disposition. She has often visited here and her entree into society will be brilliant for the Bancrofts belong to the old social regime that first lorded it over San Francisco. At the same time that Miss Richards makes her bow, Miss Dorothy Baker who has been finishing her education by a year abroad under the chaperonage of Miss Stone, will also make her debut, the two girls having been chums at the Blanchard-Gamble school. Looking over the winter's list of buds one is delightfully pleased to note what a number of pretty girls there will be. Miss Katherine Farrell who returned during the week from Europe where she has been traveling since early last spring with her mother is to be a debutante. Ila Sontag will also make her debut during the early season. Mrs. Charles H. Weller and Miss Anna Weller will give a big tea in Laurel Court next Saturday to introduce the pretty little bud to their circle of friends. Mrs. Julian Sontag is planning to present her daughter at a ball later in the month.

Weddings of Interest to Society

A wedding of interest to Californians will take place today at Saint Anne's Church, Annapolis, when Miss Cornelia Wyntje Baird, daughter of Captain and Mrs. William Baird will become the bride of William Whinery Hicks, a lieutenant in the Coast Artillery Corps. An elaborate reception will follow immediately after the ceremony at Carvel Hall. Mrs. Baird was Miss Minnie Dawley, daughter of Mrs. Olive Dawley, a well known resident of San Francisco some years ago. The bride is a niece of Mrs. Carter, wife of Brigider-General Carter. After a honeymoon trip the bride and groom will reside in Newport where the groom is at present stationed.

The wedding of Miss Lee Breckenridge and Joseph Ingram Thomas took place on Wednesday at the residence of the bride's aunt Mrs. H. H. Henderson in Berkeley, Rev. George Eldridge of St. John's Presbyterian Church officiating. The bride is a member of a distinguished family of the south that has given many prominent men to national affairs. Mr. Thomas is a mining man from Cleveland, Ohio. The couple will reside in Salt Lake. Another interesting wedding took place on Wednesday when Miss Ruth Baldwin Chewning, only daughter of William Montgomery Chewning, was married to Frederick Malcolm Eaton of Boston. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Frederick W. Clampett of Trinity Church at the residence of the bride's father in Broderick street. Only relatives and a few intimate friends were present. Upon their return from the wedding tour Mr. and Mrs. Eaton will reside at 2839 Broderick street.

Headquarters For Visiting Club Women

Most of our prominent club women are now interested in the plans of the State Federation to maintain headquarters in the St. Francis Portola week. A large reception committee will hold forth each afternoon in the Red Room on the mezzanine floor, from one to five and will entertain club women from all over the United States. The State President, Mrs. James B. Hume, will be in attendance each afternoon and will be ably assisted by a reception party composed of matrons from far and near who are noted for their genial hospitality. Some of the leading women who will assist Mrs. Hume are Mrs. J. N. Gowles of Los Angeles, the Vice-President of the Federation; Mrs. R. S. M. Davis of Santa Ana; Mrs. J. W. Orr, San Francisco; Mrs. Anna Little Barry, Oakland; Miss Blanche Morse, Berkeley; Miss Emily Hoppin, Yolo; Miss Meta Stofen, Sonoma; Miss M. E. Merriam, Chico; Mrs. W. V. Grimes, Pacific Grove; Mrs. Cora E. Jones, Oakland; Mrs. R. J. Water, Los Angeles; Mrs. Julius Kahn, San Francisco; Miss Jennie Partridge, San Francisco; Mrs. A. A. Fowler, San Jose; Mrs. F. H. Colburn, San Mateo; Mrs. James E. Higgins, Alameda; Mrs. William S. Wattles, Berkeley; Miss Rosemary Dobbins, Berkeley; Miss Eva Powel, Oakland; Mrs. Henry Gervais, Burlingame; Mrs. A. M. Colburn, Stanford; Mrs. Frank Bostwick, Mill Valley; Mrs. A. E. Osborn, Santa Clara; Mrs. E. L. Baldwin, San Francisco; Mrs. Edward D. Knight, San Francisco; Mrs. Lowell White, San Francisco; Mme. Emilia Tojetti, San Francisco; Mrs. A. W. Cornwall, San Francisco; Mrs. Kate A. Bulkley, Berkeley; Mrs. George Fredericks, Oakland; Mrs. William E. Colby, Berkeley; Mrs. F. L. Cockroft, Oakland; Mrs. A. A. Goddard, Sacramento; Mrs. B. F. Walton, Yuba City; Mrs. E. D. Buss, Bakersfield; Mrs. Robert Potter Hill, Sonoma; Mrs. Geo. E. Plummer, Alameda; Mrs. Alfred Black, San Francisco; Mrs. E. G. Green, Palo Alto; Mrs. C. E. Woodbury, Oakland; Mrs. W. L. Peters, San Leandro; Mrs. Willoughby Rodman, Los Angeles; Mrs. A. W. Scott, San Francisco, and Miss Christine Hart, San Francisco. These afternoon receptions are to be of the most informal character and have been arranged simply to make all club women welcome and to give them some place where they may meet one another and spend a few quiet hours. The officers of the various organizations are planning little informal musical programs.

Exhibition by Local Artists

The first of a series of art exhibitions is now going on in the hall of the California Conservatory of Music in Presidio avenue. It is open to the public every day except Fridays from 10 a. m. to 5 p. m. Among those who have contributed to the exhibition are G. F. Piazzoni, Arthur Putnam, Xavier Martinez, Maurice Del Mue, Miss Emily Travis, G. Cadenasso, Matteo Sandona, Mrs. Mary J. Menton and Ralph Stackpole. The hanging committee consisted of G. F. Piazzoni, Maurice Del Mue, Arthur Putnam, Xavier Martinez, and Miss Travis. The entrance fee of 25 cent is to be applied to the artists' hospital fund.

Miss Pasmore's Violin Recital

Miss Mary Pasmore will give a violin recital in Century Club Hall on October 25. Miss Suzanne Pasmore will assist her at the piano. The unusual talent of these young ladies has won them special recognition in local artistic circles and the program which will be given is of the sort to appeal to ardent music-lovers. It will include the "Chaconne" for violin alone, of Bach, Bruch's Concerto in G Minor, Opus 26, a Berceuse by Faure, Wieniawski's "Scherzo Tarantelle" and "La Folia" (variations serieuses) by Corelli-Leonard.

The Loring Club Concert

The concert of the Loring Club on Tuesday evening, October 12, is being looked forward to with much interest. One of the principal numbers will be Sir Charles Villiers Stanford's cycle of "Songs of the Sea" which was the success of the Leeds Festival of 1904. Mr. John Carrington will sing the important bass solo parts in this work and the accompaniments will be piano, organ and orchestra. Prominent among the other numbers will be Chadwick's "Lo, Now Night Shadows" and Kremser's "Thro' Whispering Boughs," the latter being for two choirs of men's voices. The pianist of the evening will be Mr. Frederick Maurer Jr., and Mr. Wallace A. Sabin, the conductor of the club, will direct the concert.

Some of the arrivals from abroad now at the Fairmont are Harvey Bowring and party from London, H. K. Frye and wife, London, Dr. Franz Popper, Vienna, M. and Mme. Rossallin de Crandeville, Paris, Dr. Frances de Crue and family, Geneva, Julien Printzer and Alexander Frankel, Budapest, Alexander Kniever, Vienna, H. Prudhomme and wife, Antwerp.

Billie Burke in "Love Watches"

To Gladys Unger and Billie Burke I am indebted for an evening of unalloyed pleasure spent at the Van Ness Theatre; to Gladys Unger because of her masterly dramatic handiwork; to Billie Burke because of the charm of her personality and the captivating quality of her art. Doubtless Billie Burke would be satisfying in any sort of theatric contrivance that served as a pretext for the disporting of herself before the footlights, but hardly less welcome than the divinely fair and fascinating actress is the delicious little comedy through which she romps and smiles and lightly plays upon our susceptible emotions. Here is a comedy from the French which retains just enough of the Gallic flavor to make it grateful to the hyper-sensitive, puritan American palate. It is evident that in the original it was risque enough to appeal even to the jaded appetite of a blase boulevardier, but let it not be supposed that it lost its piquancy in the process of dilution. Its parentage is still obvious enough. It is no trick for the imagination to restore some of the vivid colors that have been toned down or to supply some of the lines that have been excised. The play has been transmuted from characteristic French comedy to the variety that pales by comparison but is all the more acceptable in the American theatre; in spots it is suggestive, but on the whole the humor of it is delicate and refined. The theme is one that has been treated much more broadly by Henry Arthur Jones —that of a young wife who, believing her husband to have been unfaithful, leaves home to revenge herself by annexing a lover. But whereas in "Love Watches" the wife is guilty of only a mild indiscretion, in "Rebellious Susan," the Jones play, the wife plunges into something more than a platonic flirtation. The moral of the play as Jones facetiously remarks is "That as women cannot retaliate openly, they may retaliate secretly—and lie!" I am glad that Billie Burke in "Love Watches" doesn't have to go as far as Rebellious Susan. Billie Burke is the quintessence of innocent girlhood. Her type incarnates the purity of sheer beauty. She is as enchanting to her own sex as she is alluring to the masculine devotee of the exaltations of a passionate life. One does not like to think of so sweet a girl doing vulgar things even in make-believe land. Besides, this frank, ingenuous woman with a wild rose-bloom in her face and a hill-wind freshness in all her features would seem incongruous in a role steeped in the atmosphere of deceit and immoral intrigue. How easy it is thus to rhapsodize about Billie Burke! Nay, how difficult in discussing her to abstain from rhapsody! The most self-restrained and unemotional of critics have gone epithet-hunting in obedience to the irresistible impulse to feed her on metaphors and turn their phrases to trim the theme aright. And yet this is distinctly a poet's job, for none but the poet can give expression through the instrument of words to the untranslated, undefined uncertainty of grace that resides in a beautiful woman. It would be unjust to Billie Burke, however, to dwell exclusively upon her physical charms, on her bud-mouth, her madding ineffable nose, her arms seductively white and her eyes filled with strange lights and depths of shadow. For Billie Burke is an actress with an exquisite gift for mimicry. She has temperament and talent. There is never a trace of consciousness or exaggeration in her method. She imparts to her phases of mimicry an elusive quality that merges them into reality beyond suspicion. Never does she resort to any of the familiar expedients for the outer show of what is sometimes regarded as consummate artistry, but even in so simple a comedy as the one in which she is playing she reveals to us the celestial glories of pure imagination. She seems at all times utterly innocent of acting; seems, indeed, to be doing nothing more than realizing her own radiant self. Her stage craft is the efflorescence of her charm. So Billie Burke is something more than a stage beauty, for in her there is that more precious beauty of the mind shining through the mask of the flesh. She has come to us as a star, the youngest in the theatre firmament, and there is none to dispute or challenge her qualifications. At the same time, it should be mentioned, she has come to us with a company that contains some mighty good talent. When she was last here supporting John Drew she more than divided the honors with that veteran of the stage. Now she is supported by Ernest Lawford and that gentleman achieves almost as much distinction as herself. He is not perhaps, what is technically known as the hero of the play, but he has a "fat" part and he lards the lean stage with it at every opportunity. As a dry-as-dust literary gentleman with latent amorous proclivities and a personality that inspires nothing more than amiable toleration, he proves himself an artist of the first rank.

—Theodore Bonnet.

The Orpheum This Week and Next

If it would not seem so much like disparagement of the rest of a good program one might be inclined to say that the motion pictures were the "bill-toppers" at the Orpheum this week. The Orpheum motion pictures are too lightly regarded; the ladies usually put on their hats and the gentlemen reach for their overcoats as soon as the theatre darkens for their presentation. In timeliness and fidelity to the interest of contemporary man the motion pictures are probably a little bit in advance of the rest of vaudeville. Motion pictures more thoroughly down to date than those shown this week could hardly be imagined for they represented that week of aviation at Rheims which will go into history as one of the most remarkable and world-important gatherings of modern life. To say that these pictures arouse enthusiasm and wonder is to understate their effect; as a matter of fact they bring aviation and its recent development to the understanding of San Francisco with a startling force only inferior to that which awoke New York from its indifference when Wilbur Wright doubled Bartholdi's statue. Of course there was much besides the motion pictures in the show. Mary Norman, one of the most capable satirists on the stage, gave her laughable philosophy of hats and told an incident of the New York streets with straightforward intensity. The Brahms quartet and the Big City quartet vied for honors. The former consists of four young women, fair and tastefully gowned. Their music of voice and instrument was so happily chosen and so sweetly rendered that the audience was loth to let them go. The masculine quartet of vocalists made good in the conventional way of all capable quartets. It would be hard to say whether Pilu, the mind-reading dog or Henry Clive, the burlesque magician, pleased the audience more. There are always those who like to see an animal simulate human intelligence and there are plenty of others whose sense of humor is tickled by the exposure of such tricks. Both sorts were pleased by these two numbers of the program. James Young whose reputation as an exponent of Shakespearian roles has preceded him to this city is agreeably successful in a skit built upon a conventional farce deception but there are no real demands made upon his histrionic ability. Les Myosotis, fine ballet dancers, received the usual grudging applause which the Orpheum audience yields to imported artists of this description. Edna Aug, a local favorite of the ante-fire days, renewed old acquaintances in her comic "Types." Some of these acts will be seen again next week—Mary Norman, the dog Pilu and Young in his tabloid farce. The motion pictures will be changed which seems a pity; but that is the secret of their success. The newcomers promise well. Valerie Bergere returns in a skit called "The Sultan's Favorite." It is almost as down to date as the Rheims pictures, dealing with the recent dethronement of Abdul and requires a company of six or more. There will also be the Tuscany Troubadours, Reynard, a ventriloquist who presents a play with the aid of automata, the six Glinserettis, gymnasts who made a hit here before, and Carlin and Clark, German comedians.

"The Girl Question" at the Garrick

The first of a series of three La Salle Theatre, Chicago, successes starts an engagement of one week at the Garrick tomorrow afternoon. "The Girl Question," "Honeymoon Trail," and "The Time, the Place and the Girl," will appear in succession. "The Girl Question" was here last season at the Van Ness. It is a musical play with an absorbing plot of heart interest, yet written along slangy, funny lines that excite great merriment. The company is a large one headed by the comedian John L. Kearney whose former appearances here have made him quite a favorite. Supporting him is Dorothy Maynard, a beautiful soubrette. There are seventy others in the production. Notable among the songs are "Be Sweet to me, Kid," "Waltz with me till I'm dreamy," "There's no place like home," "It's bye bye, Pal," "The old Buck and Wing," "I'd like to hear you call me Honey," "When Eyes like yours look into eyes like mine" and "I hate to work on Monday." The usual matinees of the Garrick are Sunday, Thursday and Saturday.

The Rose Blooms Again at the Alcazar

An appropriate stage offering at this time, when Califorina's early history occupies so much attention, is "The Rose of the Rancho," which is to be revived at the Alcazar Monday evening and throughout the week. The play was built by two native Californians, David Belasco and Richard Walton Tully, and it treats of life in California while the missions were on the decline. It is full of the langorous Spanish atmosphere that was routed by the advent of American progress. If it had been specially written to introduce and accompany the Portola festivities, it could not more fully harmonize with their spirit. Bessie Barriscale will again be seen as Juanita, her best role, and Will R. Walling will play Kearny, the government agent, Charles Dow Clark is cast for the Padre, Louis Bennison is admirably bestowed as Kincaid, the land-jumper, Harrison Ford will play Sammy, the lieutenant of militia, and Grace Travers will be the Rose's chum. All the other principal characters will be played by the same people who had them last season. The entire scenic equipment has been renovated.

Western Play at Ye Liberty

On Monday evening the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will present "The Halfbreed," the play of western life written by Harry D. Cottrell and Oliver Morosco. This play has been a popular success with stock companies all over the country. When first presented at the Burbank Theatre, Los Angeles, it ran for five weeks and it was played to by both the Valencia and Colonial stock companies in this city. The authors have laid the scenes of "The Halfbreed" in the Indian Territory in the year 1899 when the Indian raids created so much disturbance. Sydney Ayres will be seen in the leading role. For Portola week Richard Walton Tully's new play, "Cupid, the Cow-Punch," will be Ye Liberty's offering.

"The Great John Ganton" at the Valencia

On Sunday night "The Great John Ganton," a drama of American business life written by J. Hartley Manners from Arthur J. Eddy's novel, "Ganton & Co.," will begin a run of one week at the Valencia. The play comes direct from the Lyric Theatre in New York where it has had a long and prosperous run. The principal role is played by George Fawcett, one of the foremost character actors of the present day. In the part of John Ganton Fawcett is said to have a role that fits his personality like a glove. Surrounding Fawcett is a group of artists well known to the New York players. The company numbers twenty-five, including Thurston Hall, John Webster, Lucius Henderson, Allen Fawcett, Louis Breenson, George Caldwell, Charles Gay, Jack Barnes, Frank Smithers, Fanchon Campbell, Elisie Scott, Ruth Tomlinson, Emilie Callaway and Florence Glenn. Matinees will be given on Wednesday and Saturday.

"The Third Degree" Coming

Apropos "The Third Degree," which Henry B. Harris will present at the Van Ness commencing Monday, October 18, it is generally conceded that Charles Klein knows what the public wants and gives it to them at the proper time. So much has been said and written lately about the brutality resorted to by police officials in extorting confessions from suspected criminals that Klein concluded it about time to introduce his topical problem play. New York endorsed the play and it ran for seven months at the Hudson Theatre. It will be pre-

Miss Billie Burke will continue to present "Love Watches" at the Van Ness all next week with matinees on Wednesday and Saturday.

Lion-Taming at the Chutes

The taming of the big lion, Wallace, is attracting much attention at the New Chutes this week and the exhibitions given every afternoon and night by Frank Hall, the English animal trainer, will be continued Sunday and all next week. Twice each day Hall enters the den of the beast and puts him through his paces. A family of twenty trick monkeys have been brought to the Fillmore street park this week. Other features introduced especially for the children include circus ponies, a new merry-go-round, the free moving picture theatre and a band of clowns. For the elders there are the matinee and evening concerts by the California State Band, various aerial acts and the surprises of the "joy jaunt." The "North Pole Expedition" continues to be as popular as it is timely.

Charlotte Thompson's Latest

Miss Charlotte Thompson, the playwright who was formerly a teacher in the San Francisco School Department has written a new play for Margaret Anglin which was produced in New York last week. It is an adaptation of Margaret Deland's novel "The Awakening of Helena Richie." "This drama," says Louis De Foe in the New York World, "will bear favorable comparison with any of the plays in the old emotion repertoire so popular twenty years ago, but now somewhat out of fashion because of a lack of actresses properly equipped to give them expression. It exhibits comparatively few of the defects which usually mar narrative fiction altered to fit the needs of stage performance. Miss Thompson has displayed excellent judgment in stripping the essential dramatic episodes from the voluminous incidents of the printed book and in preserving only such characters as are necessary to a clear development of the play. She has also managed uncommonly well to retain the tale's original atmosphere. Previous knowledge of the book is quite unnecessary for a complete understanding of the drama. The story, as it stands, is gloomy, but that is not a fair ground for objection. Dramatically, it is vigorous and direct and steadily cumulative in interest. There are moments when the action lags behind the dialogue; the opening act, especially the scene between Lloyd Prior and Helena, might to advantage be quickened, and there are two or three other incidents which, on their surface, seem superfluous. But on the whole the play gets down to business quickly, its characters are skillfully introduced and their essence is unobtrusively made clear. Best of all, the dialogue is not permitted to drift into long-winded speeches, and none of the incidents of the action, unlike in most dramatized novels, take place out of view of the audience."

In the Limelight

Stephen Phillips, author of "Nero," "Ulysses," "Paolo and Francesca" and other poetic dramas, was summoned to an examination in the London Bankruptcy Court recently but did not go, explaining that he lacked the price of a railway ticket from Brighton where he lives. As the fare from Brighton to London is only a dollar it looks as though Phillips' works have not paid.

James O'Neill Jr. is a member of the company appearing in James Forbes' comedy "The Traveling Salesman."

George M. Cohan himself will appear in the leading role of his musical comedy "The Yankee Prince" at the Van Ness next month. Supporting him will be his father, mother and sister and nearly a hundred others. It will be his first appearance here in over six years.

Sousa will give eight concerts in Dreamland Rink commencing November 4, under the management of Will Greenbaum.

Greenbaum's season will open with recitals by Miss Marie Nichols, a talented violinist and Madame Jomelli, the singer of the Manhattan opera company.

George Fawcett who will be seen here next week will be remembered by the hit he made in the part of the big cowboy in "The Squaw Man."

Hedwig Reicher, the beautiful German actress who has recently made her debut in America, is ambitious of world-honors and has already used three languages as her medium of expression, German, English and—Esperanto!

The fact that "The Witching Hour" was rejected by several managers before it was finally produced serves to recall to memory that "The Climbers" and "Leah Kleschna," both successful plays, met with the same fate.

John Drew has for his sixteenth successive year as a Charles Frohman star once more brought a comedy to the stage of the Empire Theatre. The character of George Bullin, most terrific of lovers, affords Mr. Drew opportunities for sprightly action, amusing facial play, with occasional passages of sentiment and dramatic force.

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

Written exclusively for Town Talk by J. M. JACOBI

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

Evening Clothes for Social Affairs

While in London I asked the question whether blue or green dress suits were really worn by those who dictate fashion for England and other countries and the answer invariably was that while green, brown or blue in their very darkest shades may be worn by ultra fashionables, it is only on rare occasions. The men who do wear colors other than black usually have from three to five dress suits in their wardrobe, but in America those who often wear evening dress clothes have an aversion for conspicuous shades or anything attractive by reason of exaggeration of cut or style. "Rich but not gaudy" is the idea of American full dress fashion.

Young chaps lean somewhat towards the rougher fabrics and also towards slight twills or herring bones, but the weave is scarcely noticeable. The chief distinction of this season's dress coat is its length, its defined waist line and its grace over the hips and never before has there been such a pretty effect created in a dress suit. The accompanying illustration shows the concave but natural effect of the shoulder, the graceful lapel and the moulding skirts. As to the usage of the evening suit we refer to a previous issue of "Town Talk" where all details can be found or a letter addressed to the editor of this column will be answered by return mail.

The New Waistcoats

Evening waistcoats will be for nearly all occasions white, either pique or silk. However, it is wise to have a black waistcoat in one's wardrobe for white ones are not always clean and available. The opening of the waistcoat will be somewhat smaller but of a decided "U" box shape which is a decided improvement on the "V" shape of last season. There are but very few of these waistcoats made to order as one can secure them from a first class haberdasher or clothier at prices ranging from $4.50 to $12.00 as against $15.00 to $25.00.

The trousers are still made with braid at the side and cut straight and comfortable and not big at the thigh and about sixteen inches bottom. Jewelry should not be very ostentatious, a set of pearl studs with links to match will cover it all.

Tie frames to hold the tie in place are used a great deal now and these also are furnished in pearl. There is an innovation on the dress vest, a rubber section on the inside attached by a button to be fastened to the button of the trousers which will stop the waistcoat from bulging out at the shirt front.

The proper overcoat to be worn with full dress is hard to define as it depends upon the weather or upon the conveyance. The "Chesterfield" is in general use; so is the "Slip On" or "English" overcoat made of mohair front with silk and rubber back for rain. While we are speaking of this coat we would like to call attention to its popularity. In England and New

THE FULL DRESS PROTECTOR

York this "Piccadilly Slip On," as it is called, is worn a great deal. Then there is the double breasted Ulster, the Protector Coat, and the Inverness, but the most suitable of all for dress will be found in the illustration. It is a Dress-Protector, lined with pearl grey satin completey enveloping and thoroughly protecting the shirt front and dress suit. The illustration shows without a question that this is the handsomest and most practical dress coat ever designed.

Here is a cold douche for aspiring playwrights administered by a professional play reader: "Out of more than two hundred unsolicited manuscripts picked out at random and representative of the rest, the gold ran only one play to the hundred, and in each case the name on the cover of the good play would have insured a careful reading in any office in the land."

Paris has just erected a monument to Jean Francois Regnard who at one time divided the honors of the comic drama with Moliere. According to Sarcey a Regnard play "is gaiety itself and must be acted skipping about and laughing."

Monsieur Le Marquis

clamor arose on his path. Was it self-sacrifice or sheer lunacy that had prompted the man to pass the threshold of death of his own accord?

The judge interrogated him severely:

"Citizen, how dare you interrupt the roll-call?"

"Citizen, you pronounced my name. I am the Marquis de Saint-Fleury."

"You? You are mad!"

"Pardon, citizen, I have all my head on my shoulders, seeing that I have just made you the offer of it," he replied, bowing in ironical deference. Several people laughed.

The man who thus trifled with the death-penalty was neither old nor young. He had the shabby appearance of one whom life has worsted, yet betrayed in his dignified bearing that indefinable something which is more potent to reveal the gentleman than titles or insignia. From the pocket of his doublet he took out his papers of identification, and handed them to the judge.

The men glanced down the papers, seeing at once that they constituted a perfectly authentic patent of nobility. Irritated at being thrown out of their stride by an additional victim thrusting himself into their hands in this gratuitous way with his high-toned clumsiness, they exclaimed:

"But, after all, we have nothing to do with you. Your name is not on the list; the name we have is that of the ex-Marquise de Saint-Fleury."

All eyes turned towards the pale woman who had instinctively drawn near on hearing her name. She hung her head like a creature self-convicted of the crime of cowardice.

Was he going to crush her, out of revenge for the humiliation he had endured through her? Or was he going to sacrifice himself for her—why should he? For at first sight she had recognized the man of the church of St. Roch, the man whose misery she had exploited, the real Marquis de Saint-Fleury.

"Your wife, doubtless?"

The Marquis scanned her face with a rapid glance, and, turning to the judges, said:

"Pardon, citizens, I have lived alone all my life."

It was said so simply that no one suspected his sincerity; one of the guards, moreover recognized him, and slapped him on the shoulder with: "Parbleu! Why, it is Citizen Saint-Fleury! More by token, he has been my neighbor, on the same floor, for years and years! He lives by himself. He is a poor man, though he shares what he has with the needy."

The judges interrupted the speaker. All that mattered little. The question was: Why had he so gratuitously offered his life to the judges in this way? The accused woman was pretty—!

"Do you assert that you don't know this woman, Citizen Fleury?"

The Marquis turned to look her straight in the face. He saw her beauty, and he saw the fright she was in. Faithful to his plighted word, he bowed gracefully, and said:

"Madame, I regret to say that I do not know you." Then he added: "I have never had the pleasure of being received at your house; you have never done me the honor to come to mine. You are too beautiful, and I am too poor."

Then he turned to the judges and announced:

"Citizens, I believe I heard this woman sing one evening; she is the Citoyenne Ninon Duchene of the Theatre Lyrique. So you behead song-birds, now, do you?"

She raised her eyes in hope; her head grew erect. She looked at the Marquis. At this moment the face of the man who was offering his life for hers bore to her eyes the all-conquering beauty of a savior's face.

The judges grinned and leered. "Oho! Is that the celebrated divette Duchene?"

"Why not make her sing?" suggested the Marquis. "Her voice will furnish her best credentials."

"Let her sing! let her sing!" shouted the crowd.

Ninon Duchene did not wait to be asked twice. Her courage returned the moment she was allowed to fight with her own weapons. Once on her own ground she was sure of victory. Was she not the darling of the public?

She closed her eyes for a moment, that she might forget the grim setting of her present stage. When she opened them again she was smiling. Never had she sung for applause as she now sang for her life:

Oh, good Master Sailor, pray, hast any news
Of my son in his ship upon the wide sea—
A good Breton lad
Whose name is Yvon?

His wages he's sent to me all these four years
And letters of love to his mother at home—
But he does not return
From the sea far away!

His brother the soldier has come from the wars
And oh! what a joy—nothing more would I ask—
If my little Yvon
Were only at home! . . .

She sang the simple Breton ballad with deep emotion.

A momentary calm fell athwart the tempest of Revolution. It was like hearing a bird sing. All those condemned victims,

Adequate Service

The definition of adequate service given by the Wisconsin state utilities commission is as follows:

"Adequate service is not necessarily the best service which it is possible to give, but rather the best service which can be given with due regard to economy to the consumer and the company."

In other words, what may be possible in the largest cities with their hundreds of thousands of gas consumers, may not be practicable in communities of smaller size, because the NECESSARY COST of such service would be prohibitive to most citizens.

At the same time generally adequate service anywhere must meet two broad requirements:

1—It must be reasonably efficient and constant.

2—It must be available to the majority of citizens.

An often interrupted service is dear at any price. Service obtainable only by those living in the closely built up or favored sections is not fair to people of moderate means, nor to the best interests of the city as a whole.

The gas company believes in conducting its business in the most liberal, alert and progressive manner, and has been and is willing to make heavy investments for extensions if there is even a possibility of realizing profit at some future time.

By making its service available in all parts of the city and maintaining a high standard of efficiency the gas company has aided materially in creating desirable residence districts and has greatly enhanced real estate values.

In every way determined efforts are made by the company to maintain its service not only up to the standard set by utilities commissions in states that have them, but beyond such standard.

storm-tossed on the ocean of wild human passion—ha! not they too, like little Yvon, a mother or sister somewhere asking for news of them, news they would hear nevermore? None of them would ever return from this sea far away.

The strain of tender sweetness uplifted thus in the midst of blood and horror, the mother's lament at an hour like this when they were slaughtering the sons, the breath of the open sea sweeping strong with its scent of brine across the fetid courtyard, the woman who smiled and wept as she sang, touched some better chord in the herd of men; for a moment they laid aside their cynicism and ceased from their hideous work.

One of the judges applauded, and all present followed suit in a sudden burst of French enthusiasm. The mob on the wall clapped and shouted: "Vive Ninon!"

Alone the Marquis de Saint-Fleury stood looking at her with an enigmatic smile. She noticed that he was giving no sign of admiration. Doubtless he despised her for singing for her life. A flush of shame mantled her pale face.

"Citoyenne Duchene, we were misinformed. It was your name that gave rise to suspicion."

A jeering voice was heard saying: "These actresses dearly love to wrap themselves up in a high-sounding title!"

"Let her go," ordered the judges. Ninon Duchene was saved.

An official sauntered up to her with jaunty familiarity, and addressed her under his breath. The pseudo-marchioness no longer imposed upon him any show of respect; she was an equal, a woman of easy virtue, no doubt.

"Come on, Ninon, come with me!"

She recoiled instinctively, with a shudder from head to foot. After halting on the threshold of death where all was raised to a higher level, after a flash of sincere feeling in which her womanhood had awakened into life, this brutal lapse into vulgarity stunned her. She burned with indignation.

The Marquis turned to the officials and said in a tone of dignity: "Come, citizens, let there be an end to this. Be content with the Marquis de Saint-Fleury. I am the last of my name. We have wasted time enough trifling. I am anxious to tread in the footsteps of my King."

This speech condemned him to death.

He looked happy and relieved. After his dreary life and his undignified "mesalliance," he felt that a voluntary death would rehabilitate him a little. He had shaken off his chain; he was a free man. As for that woman—pah! so beautiful and so cowardly.

She seemed to divine his thought. Her face crimsoned.

"Come, Ninon, come on, my dear!" The guard wound his arm uncouthly round her waist and tried to lead her away—away to a life of shame.

What was taking place in the woman's soul?

Moved by a feeling hitherto unknown, she yielded to a sudden impulse. Her true nature, so long stifled by a luxurious, indolent life, stood revealed: stung into being by the word of a generous man.

With a spontaneous movement of sincerity she brushed the guard aside and sprang forward to the man who had saved her. He had given her a lesson in nobility worthy of his name by sacrificing himself in her stead.

"Marquis! I release you from your parole."

He looked her over from head to foot, intentionally refusing to understand her. "Citoyenne, you are free; what further do you desire? Peace!"

She reddened under the quiet scorn with which he crushed her. Deeply did she crave the respect of this man. His conduct inspired her with a sudden pure and voluntary love, and her face glowed.

"I do not wish to owe my life to a fraud. I am the Marquise de Saint-Fleury, your wife."

He looked at her again. There was a touch of admiration in his eyes. Gravely he said, in a low voice:

"My wife? If you are not afraid to die, you may be my wife, madame."

"I no longer fear anything," she confessed, "save having to go with these men, back to the life that is over for me. I have never known how to live, but you have now taught me how to die. May I come?"

The executioners were sneering. They were furious at having been duped. "Ha! It is for us to choose. Enough of this rubbish. Samson waits for nobody. Make up your mind, one way or the other!"

"We are both quite ready," replied the young woman bravely. And before her husband could protest, as the judges hesitated, she cried fearlessly, with all the recklessness of her new-born heroism:

"Vive le Roi!"

"To death! to death!" But already she was on the way thither, hand in hand with her husband.

At the gate she wished to stand aside to let him pass, to concede to him the precedence due to his rank. But the Marquis, bowing with the tender devotion which he would have shown to his queen, and yielding precedence to her even in death, said, in a clear voice, which was audible to all:

"After you, Madame la Marquise."

Auto Notes

"One of the features of the new issue of the Studebaker-Garford cars, the new 'G-7'," says John H. Eagal of the Studebaker Bros. Co., "is the construction of the transmission case and the timing gears. These have been so designed that there is absolutely no leakage of grease possible, whether the car is in motion of at rest. The fact that many cars leak grease has been the source of much annoyance to many owners for a long time."

E. J. Huffman, who purchased the first Chalmers-Detroit "30" car delivered on the Pacific Coast last season, and who also had the distinction of getting the first 1910 Chalmers-Detroit "30" delivered, has just returned from a several days trip in Yosemite Valley. In speaking of the new car, Huffman said: "While I was in every way satisfied with the old car, I am more than pleased with the new one. It has considerable more power, and its performance is equal to that of any forty horsepower car that I know of."

On September 22 the E. R. Thomas Motor Company of Buffalo shipped to the Pioneer Automobile Company their demonstrating Model "M." This is the new six-cylinder fifty horsepower car, which the Thomas Company are putting on the market for the coming season. This car which is a shaft driven five passenger machine has received very favorable comment in the east.

Mr. and Mrs. L. C. Worden came to San Francisco recently, having driven up in their new Chalmers-Detroit "30." They report the roads in fair condition.

Robert Fowler who has recently taken the agency for the Chalmers-Detroit and Hudson cars in Gilroy, Watsonville, Hollister and Salinas recently visited the country home of Henry Miller on Mt. Maddonna, negotiating one of the steepest grades in the Santa Cruz Mountains, which was covered with six inches of sand, and making eleven miles in thirty-five minutes.

The first of the racing cars and drivers that are going to compete in the Oakland Portola road race are established with their assistants along the Oakland course. Even at this early date the machines have reached as high as 80 miles an hour on the stretch, from Fruitvale to Haywards. All of the drivers now on the course report the roads in perfect condition and say that record breaking speed will be made in the big contest. Cliff Ontank with his six-cylinder Stevens-Duryea, Frank Murray in a Buick, Charles Saules in his Stearns, Earl Cooper in a Pennsylvania, Gordan Murray in a Lexington and Harry Michiner in a Lozier are among the racing drivers who are already established on the course. From present indications there will be a record breaking crowd on the course. Reports received by Leslie E. Burks, secretary and attorney for the Automobile Club of California, show that auto enthusiasts are coming from all over the State. One conservative estimate places the crowd at 200,000. This will undoubtedly be increased by the thousands of visitors at the Portola Festival.

Announcement has just been made by Thomas B. Jeffery & Company of the new Rambler for 1910. In some respects this Rambler announcement is the most unusual of the year. There are five models built upon three different chasses, all with four-cylinder engines, magnetos and 36-inch wheels.

The new Studebaker car carries an electric lighting equipment besides the prestolite equipment. A separate electric generator, gear driven, mounted on the motor base, generates the current for all five lamps. Oil may also be used in the side lamps. The electric lights may be switched on and off by push buttons under the operator's seat. The Studebakers still have the exclusive American rights to the Bosch magnetic make-and-break ignition system. This system of ignition is recognized by automobile experts as being so far superior to the other ignition devices that there is little or no chance for comparison. The construction of the magneto used on the new "G-7" is such that ignition trouble is practically impossible.

Two carloads of the new issue of the Studebaker-Garford cars, duplicates of the car which was used by President Taft in Berkeley, have been received at the local Studebaker branch.

Social Activities

By far the biggest social event of Portola week will be the invitational ball to be given at the Fairmont on the evening of October 20. San Francisco's smartest society will be there to receive all the visiting notables. The ball room will present a dazzling appearance of light and color, for in addition to the feminine splendor the foreign diplomats will don their most gorgeous uniforms and the army and navy officers will appear in full military dress. Among the notables who are to be present at this function are the Spanish minister, Marquis Villalabor and his staff, and Dr. Loudon, minister of the Netherlands. British, Italian, German, Japanese and Dutch naval officers will grace the ball.

Already nearly the entire seating capacity of the colonial ball room of the St. Francis and most of the loges have been taken for the series of concerts to be given by the St. Francis Musical Art Society. Among those who will have season boxes are Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Scott, Charles T. Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. Walter S. Martin, Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Wheeler, Mr. and Mrs. James Ellis Tucker, Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Butters, Mr. and Mrs. William Mintzer and Mr. and Mrs. William G. Irwin.

Epigram and Wit

An attractive little booklet under the title "Pippins and Peaches" has been put forth by the Reilly & Britton Company of Chicago. Its contents are made up of the clever sayings and witty epigrams of "Mme. Qui Vive," (Mrs. Helen Follett Jameson), the successful editor of the woman's page of the Chicago Record-Herald. Illustrations, in the way of marginals, page decorations and cover design, are by James Orton Smith of the Caslon Press, while the full page drawings, the "Peaches" are the work of Penrhyn Stanlaws. The epigrams bear a general resemblance to the style of wit and humor we have grown familiar with in the annual "Cynic's Calendar," the "Perverted Proverbs," and other like productions. There seems to be a large and growing demand for booklets of this order, especially for the holiday trade, and "Pippins and Peaches" is pretty enough to charm the coin from the closest mouthed purse.

"Half a Chance"

Frederick S. Isham's novel, "Half a Chance," will please the advocates of soft methods with criminals, though it is but recently that a Chicago judge has denounced the "other chance for a fellow" as being practical encouragement to law breakers. However, looking at it from another angle, Mr Isham may be interpreted as holding a brief for a system of solitary confinement and indefinite sentence. Very likely he would disclaim any intention whatever beyond that of writing a readable romance. The tale takes us back to the days when English criminals, transported to the Antipodes, were sternly cautioned not to put foot on English soil again on penalty of execution. Incidentally it sheds a ray of light on the methods of the police who, predetermined to rid themselves of bad characters, could always find witnesses with the necessary, convincing testimony. The victim of the law in this instance is a young sailor, American born, altogether illiterate, but endowed with what Mulvaney has designated as "educated fists." He had turned professional pugilist, and under the title of 'Frisco Pet, had been a popular favorite among sports until he essayed two battles at once, one with a rival and the other with bold John Barleycorn. The Pet, defeated, was dropped from his pedestal and became a petty criminal who lacked both the skill and the cunning to go far or fast in his new career. A sordid crime was committed and it was convenient for all parties concerned to manipulate the evidence so that it was the erstwhile "Pet" who was convicted and sentenced to transportation. The ship which carried the involuntary exiles was likewise the one upon which there sailed as passengers Lord Wray, the newly appointed governor, his wife, their little orphaned niece and Lord Ronsdale, who was secretly connected with the crime for which the "Pet" was paying the penalty. The vessel was lost on the voyage, and the facilities being limited, the passengers and crew embarked in the boats, leaving the convicts to their fate, but the little girl, Jocelyn, having escape from under the eyes of her guardians, returned to her cabin to rescue a pet bird, and was left behind. The convicts were freed from their confinement, and it was the "Pet" who discovered the child, fearless because she did not gauge her danger, cool and collected. His sailor sight revealed to him that one of the boats was returning towards the wreck and surmissing that Jocelyn had been missed by her friends, he leaped into the sea with her, swimming towards the rescuers. The natural impulse of the others was to draw him into the boat with them, but Ronsdale, cool, calculating and determined, secretly dealt him a cowardly blow which loosened his grasp. In the moment of time given to him the convict recognized in him a haunting impression of a face seen on the night of the murder in the squalid London lodging, and a new motive for living was instilled into him,—revenge. The natural theory concerning the shipwreck was that all the convicts had perished, and Ronsdale dismissed the subject from his mind. Had this been the case, "Half a Chance" would have closed with its third chapter, but floating wreckage, tropical islands and the flotsam and jetsam of the ocean perform their traditional offices for the derelict. One must take the goods the gods provide and not question too closely into the probabilities of a large case of heavy bool s floating for days and nights, to be cast ashore at last, nor waste gray matter in theorizing on the probabilities that an illiterate and desperately disappointed man would not have used the tomes to feed his fire rather than have saved them until such time as, driven by lack of other pursuits, he taught himself to peruse and appreciate them. If we are going to demand scientific proofs of every assertion we shall have to forego much in this world. At all events, Mr. Isham has assembled his characters in London once more, at the end of seven or eight years, when one of the sensations of the day is the work of a barrister, John Steele, who makes a specialty of defending the hard pressed, and whose knowledge of criminal law is phenomenal. His fees are trifling, and altogether he is something of a mystery to his world. The reader, of course, is a party to the secret, and a spectator to the game of hide and seek through which Lord Ronsdale, when he suddenly discovers or at least, suspects the identity of Steele, sets his secret agents at work to procure the evidence which will revive the old sentence of capital punishment for a returned convict, while Steele, equally determined to prove his own innocence and to frustrate the unworthy Ronsdale's intentions of marrying the heiress, Jocelyn Wray, is brought into conflict with his former criminal mates and the police powers that secured his conviction, and the best man wins, with a manly confession to Sir Charles Wray, whose case of books, cast at his feet had furnished the means for a self education, given half a chance. But the truth is that at the present age of the world's progress it is not the lack of half a chance that youth suffers from but the bewilderment of choice among so many chances, and possibly our educators may take a hint therefrom, that isolation and concentration may be stronger factors in the matter of brain cultivation than crowds and confusion. "Half a Chance" is a good average specimen of twentieth century fiction. From the Bobbs-Merrill Co.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 18,665.

WILLIAM C. ESPY, sometimes known as W. C. ESPY, and MARY CATHERINE ESPY, his wife, Plaintiffs,

vs.

All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California, to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of WILLIAM C. ESPY, sometimes known as W. C. ESPY, and MARY CATHERINE ESPY, his wife, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and county, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, bounded and more particularly described as follows:

Parcel No. 1. Commencing at a point on the Northerly line of "A" Street, distant thereon eighty-two (82) feet six (6) inches Westerly from the Westerly line of Tenth Avenue; running thence Westerly along the said Northerly line of "A" Street twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Northerly one hundred (100) feet; thence at right angles Easterly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles Southerly one hundred (100) feet to the Northerly line of "A" Street and the point of commencement. Being a portion of Outside Lands Block number Two Hundred and Seventy-four (274).

Parcel No. 2. Commencing at a point on the Easterly line of Third Avenue, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet Southerly from the Southerly line of Clement Street; running thence Southerly along said Easterly line of Third Avenue twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Easterly one hundred and twenty (120) feet; thence at right angles Northerly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles Westerly one hundred and twenty (120) feet to the Easterly line of Third Avenue and the point of commencement. Being a portion of Outside Lands Block number One Hundred and Eighty-three (183).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That the above entitled Court make and enter its decree:

1st.—Ascertaining and determining all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description.

2nd.—Establishing and determining the title of plaintiff to said property and that plaintiff be adjudged and decreed to be the owner in fee simple absolute of all of said property.

3rd.—For such other and further relief as to the Court may seem just.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 25th day of September, 1909.

(Seal) H. I. Mulcrevy, Clerk.
By M. P. Bruton, Deputy Clerk.

The first publication of this summons was made in "Town Talk" newspaper on the 2nd day of October, A. D. 1909.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 24,299, Dept. 12.

ELLA REEVES, Plaintiff,

vs.

JOHN T. REEVES, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to JOHN T. REEVES, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion and wilful neglect, and determining and adjudging that plaintiff is the owner of the certain real property described in the complaint herein, as her separate property, and also for alimony and counsel fees; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 23d day of July, A. D. 1909.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE ON SALE OF REAL PROPERTY

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 7926, Department 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of JOHN GEHERTY, Deceased.

CECELIA GEHERTY, the Administratrix of the Will annexed of the Estate of JOHN GEHERTY, deceased, having heretofore presented to the Court and filed with the Clerk thereof her verified petition praying for an Order of this Court authorizing, empowering and directing her to sell certain real property, in said petition particularly described, belonging to the estate of said deceased, and it appearing to the Court that it is necessary to sell the whole of the real property in said petition described, to pay the debts outstanding against the said deceased, and the debts, expenses and charges of administration and the family allowance, and that it is for the advantage, benefit and best interest of the estate and those interested therein that said real estate be sold:

It is hereby ordered that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased be, and they are hereby directed to appear before the above-entitled Court in the Courtroom of Department No. 10 thereof, in the Grant Building, Southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on Monday, the 25th day of October, A. D. 1909, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. of said day, to then and there show cause, if any they have, why an order should not be granted to said Administratrix with the Will annexed, for the sale of all said real property.

It is further ordered that a copy of this Order to Show Cause be published in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation, printed and published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, once a week for four (4) successive weeks.

Dated, San Francisco, September 16, A. D. 1909.

Our Carnival

San Francisco in carnival array reminds us that next week we are to have a big house-warming, and for a brief space to have surcease of madding strife, forgetting the while our troubles and our mischief-makers. It is a pleasant and refreshing prospect after a protracted season of bickering and backbiting. If all goes well "blithe hearts will make many a blooming visage," and mirth and jollity will be entirely unconfined. By means of a great jollification we are to acquaint the world with the fact that the spirit of the old town has returned and proclaim to all and sundry that here by the Golden Gate, the city that was famous for its atmosphere and its exotic individuality is doing business as of yore. But of course we are not going to permit the genius of commerce to preside over our revels. The ostensible motif of the carnival is one Don Gaspar de Portola, an historic personage whose most creditable achievement, the one that commends his memory to us, was the discovery of the beautiful harbor which made this flourishing metropolis possible. For carnival purposes the romantic name of Gaspar de Portola should suffice. The circumstance that there is some question as to the pronunciation and even the spelling of it will not in the slightest degree affect our enthusiasm; nor shall the uncertainty with respect to the basis of his claim upon our admiration render his personality less acceptable as a pretext for the unleashing of the spirit suitable to the occasion. Altogether apart from any historical significance all men feel the sanctifying character of that which is at once romantic and remote. We always like to seek our typical hero in distant and ill-recorded times. It is moreover pleasant to feel that we are in the presence of a historical personality, especially one who was of a bold and adventurous spirit, and such was the conquistadore whom we are to celebrate next week. Let us not, however, regard Portola as a lay figure upon which to drape our carnival colors. Let us yield our imagination to him, for then will he beckon us back across the wastes of time and mists of legend to a period when the dawn of modern history was breaking on the Californias, when this State was a mysterious region of unexplored valleys and virgin vistas, of nameless rivers and colossal mountain ranges; the land of dreams, of romance and adventure. That is a period which has been too much neglected in these rush days of political intrigue and commercial competition. Too long have we suffered the grass to grow on the legacies of a beautiful past and the lichen to feed on them and the ploughman to plough them into dust; too many monuments of the faded glory of the poetical period of our history have we permitted to be swept away to make room for the bargain-counters of our captains of industry. Even the history of that period we have not thought worthy of preservation, and as a consequence vague and uncertain are its outlines, incomplete and untrustworthy are the accounts of some of the most interesting events. Most of us are more familiar with the history of New England than with the history of our own State. So it is well for us to hark back occasionally to the less turbulent days of the infant commonwealth and catch a sense of the emotions that were born of the sublime impulse of the noble, self-sacrificing missionaries who wandered to the ends of the earth to spread the blessings of Christian civilization. This we are going to do next week; not of course without an eye to the present, as we cannot altogether divest ourselves of concern for our immediate, material interests; but with the Portola Festival we shall begin to make amends for years of stupid indifference to the sentimental assets of our great and growing State.

In Defense of Scepticism

There are many persons that confound attachment to a benign end with furious adherence to any set of means by which it is pursued. They urge upon us their political projects in a spirit and with a violence which tend to frustrate instruction of the understanding and solution of important problems. Of this tribe are the champions of the direct primary who, regarding it as a heaven-sent instrument for the destruction of bossism, take no account of possible consequences far more to be abhorred than the evil they hope to extinguish. Themselves fanatics of a most virulent type, and intolerant of all opposition without ever stopping to consider the arguments with which their propositions are met, they denounce as unreasonable and worse everybody who dissents from their views. An amiable contemporary illustrates what we have said, thus: "The opponents of the direct primary are congenital and incorrigible sceptics who have no faith in anything and who are aloof from reason." This is a severe and almost crushing indictment. But it is not unanswerable. In scientific matters scepticism is the first condition of earnest inquiry. Doubt is the parent of certainty and the precursor of knowledge. Doesn't experience of political catholicons teach us that we are much too credulous? We have worshipped theoretical fetishes too long and it is time for us to turn a keen impartial gaze on political problems, taking nothing upon trust, any more than we do in physical science. Here in San Francisco we have taken the direct primary on trust as we did the charter and we are already prepared for disillusionment.

A Suggestion for Our Patriots

Out of awakened China comes the news of an incident which cannot be too strongly impressed upon some of the patriots whose tender souls are anguished by the perilous condition of our beloved country. It seems that a Manchu official named Yung Lin recently addressed a memorial to the Regent on the unhappy condition of the empire and then committed suicide. Burning with patriotism the pessimistic Yung Lin set forth in his communication the manifold ills beneath which he conceived his fatherland to be staggering and then, to give special emphasis to his appeal for the redress of grievances, ostentatiously made away with himself. Mooting the possibility of this form of appeal to national conscience one cannot fail of intense enthusiasm over the likelihood of its application to our own army of purifiers. Too long have their strident jermiads on the parlous state of the nation been received with brutal indifference; the finger of skepticism has persistently probed for the selfish motives suspected to lurk behind their altruistic outcries. Their sincerity has been impugned with relentless regularity and their muckrakings have elicited scorn where patriotic concern was the particular emotion which they would have preferred to excite. Here is a golden opportunity for some of these melancholy reformers; Yung Lin has set the example of an ultimate proof of singleminded devotion to country. It would of course argue too bloodthirsty a disposition to insist that the Yung Lins of America should open a vein or drink hemlock to attest the purity of their motives; but might they not attain the same end by inflicting intense personal chastisement upon themselves? Fasting and other forms of mortification of the flesh, such as lifelong abstinence from the fleshpots of patronage, a rigid avoidance of the alluring piecounter would, in our more advanced state of civilization, create the same lasting impression of perfect sincerity which Yung Lin obtained by suicide. The suggestion is offered in good faith but with a cynical consciousness that it is not destined to prove popular with our foremost uplifters.

Barbarism in Our Public Schools

The public schools of the United States are once more in session, and in consequence we have daily reports of hazings that result in serious injuries and fatalities. And all the while Puritanism is demanding the prohibition of prize fights; and the cultivation of a tender feeling for dumb animals goes zealously on. The dear little birds and the nice little bugs are made daily subjects of sentimental palavering in every grade of our schools; even the sensitive plant school children are taught to regard with something akin to affection, but the divine injunction to love one another is never impressed upon them. They are being educated out of barbarism up to a poetic sensitiveness to nature, but the primal instinct of brutality they are permitted to indulge and cultivate, and it is in our public schools that expression is first given to man's inhumanity to man. The Bird Defenders and Bug Lovers have no compunction in maiming a mere boy; the Friend of the Sensitive Plant exults in the humiliation of a human being. This matter of hazing in the public schools is absolutely indefensible. The term "to haze" had its origin in the merchant marine service and was applied to the brutal, extra legal punishments bestowed on sailors before the mast by captains who were monarchs of their vessels and answerable to no court save that of heaven. Public schools were established and provision for their maintenance made on the supposition that the State would receive in good citizenship more than the equivalent of their cost. Today the public schools, as they are conducted, are nurseries of anarchy. The pupils have no respect for authority, and the promulgation of a rule is but the signal for its defiance.

Boston Wants Us To Know

The Boston Herald has served notice on all the States of the union that the year 1920 belongs exclusively to New England for celebration and commemoration purposes. We are not only asked to take heed but are lectured somewhat acrimoniously on the courtesy due New England which has never taken any money out of the National Treasury for exposition purposes. San Francisco is mentioned among the cities that have given big expositions. This is news to us. True, we held what was called a Mid-Winter Fair, but it was only a sort of back-wash from the Columbian Exposition held at Chicago. Boastful as the west is said to be we did no bragging over the little series of entertainments that were pulled off in Golden Gate Park. On the contrary the legacy of shacks and shanties that made an eyesore of the Ocean Beach after the fair was over induced a willingness to blot out the memory if only the reminders could be forgotten too. San Francisco contemplates giving a big exposition in celebration of the completion of the Panama Canal which some of us regard as an event of considerably more importance than the landing of the eternal Pilgrim Fathers who left us a legacy of puritanism and hypocrisy the fruits of which are not among the things cherished by men who are sensible of the essential elements of civilization. But there is no possibility of dispossessing the mind of New England of the idea that but for the landing of a handful of Pilgrims with their household goods and gods the whole continent of North America would have remained till this day a howling wilderness. New England will never abandon its attitude of step-sisterly toleration toward the rest of the country. There persists in New England much of the sentiment that prevailed in the days of Daniel Webster, who, in 1840 on the floor of Congress, announced that he would never endorse the expenditure of one cent of public funds to bring the Pacific Coast one step nearer to Boston. The anti-imperialists who so strenuously opposed the annexation of Hawaii were but echoing the sentiments of their ancestors who walked in fear and trembling lest the expansion of the country to include the Mississippi Valley should result in the beggaring of the Atlantic Coast because of the inevitable cost of feeding the population of those "barren wastes." In New England there are still persons who believe that Richard Henry Dana told the truth in his "Two Years Before the Mast" when he said that California would never be a fit habitation for the Anglo-Saxon as in the climate of this State he was bound to fall a victim of "Spanish fever," which was his euphemism for pure laziness.

Why Business is Hurt

Again we are asked, "Do you want the prosecution to stop because it hurts business?" And again we affirm that we do, but we hasten to add in anticipation of the pharisaical sneer of self-righteousness that if we had no other reason we should not assent to calling a halt. Our position in this matter is of course very well understood by our readers. Even the cabal that has sought in vain to stifle criticism with abuse is under no misapprehension. The propagandists of the graft prosecution are not insensible of the fact that their so-called moral crusade is objectionable mainly for the reason that it is utterly demoralizing. They know they are uttering a pernicious half-truth when they affirm that hostility to them is grounded in commercial greed. As they have practiced deception from the beginning so they are practicing it now when they affect to be unconscious of the felonious wrongdoing by which they earned the reprobation of all honest men. Had the graft prosecution been conducted all along upon moral principles for the purpose of sending guilty men to jail and for none other, no upright citizen would now favor its abandonment. Unjust and vindictive discrimination against certain men, who, assuming them to be guilty, were the victims of a gang of blackmailing boodlers, would not in itself be sufficient to justify the withdrawal of public support; but when the moving spirits of the enterprise adopted a policy in defiance of justice and decency, when they indulged in criminality more vicious than that which ostensibly they were seeking to punish, there was good and substantial ground for the resentment and indignation which they excited. At this late day it is unnecessary to recapitulate the high crimes and misdemeanors of our lawless uplifters. None but the hopelessly benighted and incredibly partisan confess to ignorance of the flagrant examples of the mockery and prostitution of justice which have marked the colorful career of mendacity pursued by our canting patriots. As to the hurting of business, that is but the natural result of the widespread demoralizing effect of an essentially immoral enterprise. But the Graft Prosecution has done more than hurt business for the time being. It has blackened the reputation of the community to such a degree that the effect upon the city will be felt for many a year. Even now the prosecutors are circulating more industriously than ever the report that the opposition to the graft prosecution in San Francisco is animated by nothing more than a sordid concern for business interest. In anticipation of the defeat of Heney they are preparing the public mind in foreign parts for libelous imputations against the character of the community, and their hired propagandists in pulpit and sanctum are lamenting the disposition of the people to sacrifice their honor on the altar of commerce.

We suggest that the question be referred for decision to the Moot Court of Mayor Taylor's Law School.

Gaspar de Portola having been rescued from oblivion is in a fair way of having his memory carried down to posterity along with that of Amadis de Gaul, Edward the Black Prince, John of Gaunt and Don Quixote.

A novelist named White has remarked for the benefit of the Phelan-Spreckels publicity bureau that nowhere but in San Francisco is there opposition to the graft prosecution. But it hasn't occurred to this shrewd novelist that perhaps the people of San Francisco have a more intimate acquaintance with the graft prosecution than the residents of cities some thousands of miles away.

Portola, an Artificial Hero

Being a Brief Protest Against the Glorification of a Blundering Explorer With Other Animadversions Based on the Narrative Compiled by Mr. Zoeth S. Eldredge for The California Promotion Committee

By Edward F. O'Day

Careful perusal of the thin octavo volume issued by The California Promotion Committee in anticipation of the Portola fiesta has only served to convince me of the correctness of my previous belief that the worthy Don Gaspar made a mighty poor fist of the discovery of San Francisco Bay. It had always seemed to me that San Franciscans had little cause to reproach themselves for having suffered the achievements of this soldier of Spain to lapse into oblivion and my study of his much discussed march as set forth by Mr. Zoeth S. Eldredge has suggested no reason for a change of opinion. History seldom errs in picking names for her catalogue of fame and it is rarely indeed that a great hero has to be excavated from the pit of obscurity. That the memory of Portola should have vanished so completely from the general mind that it was necessary for a few historians to disinter the proper pronounciation of his name and the record of his worth was due, I take it, to causes that are forever at labor in the great furnace of events where the unimportant pages of world-annals are reduced to ashes. Poring over the leaves of Mr. Eldredge's monograph the conviction has been more and more borne in upon me that Don Gaspar de Portola is a reconstructed hero, an artificial embodiment of the traits of romance, an obscure personality painfully rubbed to brightness by the enthusiastic Old Mortalities who abide with us. Not being of that iconoclastic humor which would smash a graven image for the vulgar pleasure of seeing the pieces fly I have no desire to cast Don Gaspar from the high places to which he is being gallantly hauled by the enterprising Portola committee, yet I deem it no less than right, in reviewing the publication of The California Promotion Committee, to set down the thoughts which have come to me during the hours spent in its study. If this be not the province of a reviewer I am much at fault and will claim no clemency from the gentleman who has been at great pains to draw the old don from the mists of history and to clarify the musty atmosphere which surrounds his dryasdust remains. At the same time I would not be understood as disparaging the Portola celebration for I am in heary accord with any movement which lets loose the carnival spirit and gives us temporary surcease from intramural woes. A figure like that of Portola about which history has been tight-lipped appeals strongly to the lover of romance because an infinite deal of things may be said of it to which the antiquarians may oppose no documentary contradiction. It was for the scope which he allowed the play of imagination, no doubt, that Don Gaspar has been revivified to make a San Francisco holiday.

The California Promotion Committee's publication is principally devoted to Mr. Eldredge's account of the march of Portola and the so-called discovery of the bay of San Francisco; but Mr. E. J. Molera has also contributed a summary of the log of the San Carlos, the frigate of Don Juan Manuel de Ayala and the first vessel to enter our port, with translations of other documents. It is with Mr. Eldredge's contribution that we are at present concerned. From this we learn that Don Gaspar de Portola first became identified with the history of California in 1767 when Don Carlos III of Spain issued the decree expelling the Jesuits from the Spanish dominions. As this great propagandic society had established a number of missions in Lower California it was necessary that somebody should be detailed to the unpleasant task of dispossessing them and Portola was assigned to the work. At that time a captain of dragoons of the Regiment of Spain stationed in western Mexico, he was appointed governor of the Californias and having been provided with twenty-five dragoons, twenty-five infantry and fourteen Franciscan friars, set sail from Tepic for the execution of his disagreeable instructions. Whether they seemed disagreeable to him, whether he was selected for the work because his previous character indicated that no religious scruples would stay his arm and in what manner he carried out his orders, history has neglected to chronicle, and Mr. Eldredge who is not given to speculation, has failed to raise the question. At any rate that was the manner of Portola's coming to California and he was still there in the following year when the Spanish king, fearing the encroachment of the Russians upon the northern coast of California, ordered the fortification of that part of his dominions. In the year 1602 Sebastian Vizcaino, an explorer who possessed many of the amiable traits of Sir John Mandeville and the Baron Munchausen, had reported the discovery of a fine port in the latitude of 37 degrees to which he had given the name of Monterey. The re-discovery of this port was deemed by the viceroy the best method of complying with the king's orders. It was decided to send out a maritime and a land expedition and Portola, volunteering to lead the latter, was appointed commander-in-chief. It is no part of my criticism of the worthy Don Gaspar to suggest that he lacked the spirit of adventure or that he was an inefficient commander; my animadversions are directed solely toward his blundering exploration. Mr. Eldredge sets forth the personnel of the expedition with commendable detail and conducts it from Velicata whence it set out in two divisions in the spring of 1769 to the bay of San Diego in a veritable Pindaric leap. "There is very little of interest in this march of some two hundred miles through a barren country to the bay of San Diego," declares our authority. "Junipero's diary lies before me; it is a dreary recital of small incidents of the march, the Indians they met, the barrancas they crossed, with pious comments, etc.; no course, no distances traveled, or other like information necessary to an understanding of the route and country." I fear that the human touch in history-writing does not appeal to Mr. Eldredge. The "small incidents" of such a march sometimes prove irresistibly interesting. I am afraid that if Mr. Eldredge had chronicled the polar dash of Dr. Cook we would never have heard of the purple ice-glow or the barrel of gum-drops—and that would have been a pity indeed. Occasionally however the picturesque does drip cautiously from Mr. Eldredge's pen as when he records how an Indian made off with Father Serra's spectacles and again how the slushy grip of a quagmire prevented the saintly man from celebrating mass. There is plenty of detail concerning the march northward from San Diego and it all goes to show that Portola was a persevering leader but a mighty poor explorer. He reminds me of that unfortunate chap who couldn't see the forest on account of the trees. The fact is that he didn't find the port of Monterey when he was actually at the port of Monterey. He found the line of high sand dunes which formed the shore line and four lagoons behind them and reached the ingenious conclusion that the port had been "swallowed up by the land" and that the lagoons were the last signs of the port. Portola may have been an excellent soldier, as I have said, but he lacked the imagination without which no explorer ever accomplished anything. Because the port of Monterey was not an enclosed harbor like San Diego Bay but an open bay or roadstead, he failed to recognize it and blundered on. That blunder brought

Tammany's Candidate

Being a Brief Record of the Evolution of a Typical Friend of the Pee-pul—Once a Tried and True Reformer, Now a Shrewd and Practical Performer

By Robert McTavish

William J. Gaynor, Justice of the Supreme Court of New York, is now in the public eye. The Mayor of New York is a figure of national interest, and as Judge Gaynor has been nominated by Tammany for that important office his personality and record have become objects of a widespread curiosity which has been heightened by his controversy with William R. Hearst, who was but recently his ardent friend and admirer and who is now his enemy and traducer. Judge Gaynor is a veteran of the political arena and one of the innumerable tribe of spectacular reformers and mob-coddlers. He has been described as "a boss-tamer in ermine," a "square judge," a "friend of the people." He has figured as the enemy of political bosses. He has vindicated his hostility to corrupt bosses by spending his money to send them to jail. He has hurled invectives against Tammany. He has denounced the financial methods of the Manhattan Traction interests and baited the Brooklyn Rapid Transit. He has reproached and reprehended rebaters and predatory plutocrats. He has defied legal precedents, and censured bench, bar and jury. In short, Judge Gaynor has proved himself facile in all the arts that are practiced by the most vociferous demagogues, and now he finds it to his advantage to be the pet of Tammany.

The friendship that formerly existed between himself and Mr. Hearst is easily understood by men who are familiar with the ways that are subtle of our leading politicians. The most unscrupulous of demagogic judges invariably enjoy the friendship of the muckraking press. The reason of this is that they are serviceable newspaper puppets. For doing the bidding of newspaper publishers; for "standing in" whenever a newspaper publisher has some pet scheme to exploit they are rewarded with publicity and praise, with space for the airing of their demagogic sentiments and their affectation of self-righteous indignation. The attitude of the Hearst newspapers in New York toward Judge Gaynor has been the same as the Boughten Bulletin's attitude toward the Hon. William P. Lawlor and the Hon. Frankie Dunne.

Judge Gaynor's public career has been most eventful, for he has been an active job-chaser. He began his career as a school teacher in Boston. In 1873 he took up the study of law in Utica and at that early period blossomed out as a reformer. Catching a lot of saloonkeepers selling liquor without a license, he won the affections of the people and was appointed police commissioner. In this job he won renown by closing some illegal road-houses. In the eighties he moved to Brooklyn and became an anti-boss politician and an all round E. P. E. Troy, developing a virtuous passion for baiting public service corporations. Of course he was rewarded. He was asked to run for Mayor but preferred the bench and was elected Justice of the Supreme Court.

David B. Hill was impressed by Gaynor's Brooklyn record and suggested him as available gubernatorial timber. But Tammy opposed him, and circulated some nasty stories about a suit for divorce brought and won by his wife. They also charged him with being a renegade Catholic. Thereupon he declined to run for Governor. Hill was nominated, and Gaynor was put on the ticket for judge of the Court of Appeals, but he declined to run saying that the reasons which compelled him to refuse the nomination for Governor precluded him from accepting another place on the ticket.

Gaynor has always had to contend against religious prejudice. As late as last year he was objected to on religious grounds. William J. Bryan wanted Gaynor for his running mate, and matters were progressing smoothly at Denver, when some of the delegates produced newspaper editorials criticising the justice's manner of abjuring his former church and attacking it from the lecture platform. Those criticisms, many of them fifteen years old, killed the Gaynor boom out of hand.

Gaynor had a boom for Governor in 1906 but Charles F. Murphy sold out to Hearst that year, and the latter was the Democratic nominee against Charles E. Hughes. Gaynor supported Hearst, saying: "Certainly I will support Hearst, and I advise every one to examine and ascertain what his political and economic principles are before deciding against him. It is a miserable man who will not look on both sides before making up his mind." That the views of Gaynor and Hearst frequently coincide is a fact patent to all, and it is probable that the latter is a disciple of the justice.

Gaynor unquestionably is a strong man before the people, for he has made it the rule of his life to be on the popular side of every question of great public interest, and as a preacher of the abstract moralities and a champion of civic virtue he is distinctly in the Roosevelt class. But like Roosevelt he is taken seriously as a moralist only by persons who are easily hoodwinked. Since his nomination the New York Sun has said that Tammany might have picked out a worse man, but that it would have been a difficult task. District Attorney Jerome has pronounced him "a political charlatan totally destitute of political courage" and "that most abhorrent product, a political judge."

Gaynor's favorite topic of discussion and the one by means of which he has scored with the plain people is the tyranny of the New York police which he has pronounced worse than that which prevails in Russia. The story of how Gaynor became conspicuous for the Mayoralty nomination is of too recent memory to bear repetition at length. On May 29 he wrote to Mc-

The Mission Dolores

By Bret Harte

The Mission Dolores is destined to be "The Last Sigh" of the native Californian. When the last "Greaser" shall indolently give way to the bustling Yankee, I can imagine he will, like the Moorish king, ascend one of the Mission hills to take his last lingering look at the hilled city. For a long time he will cling tenaciously to Pacific street. He will delve in the rocky fastnesses of Telegraph Hill until progress shall remove it. He will haunt Vallejo street, and those back slums which so vividly typify the degradation of a people; but he will eventually make way for improvement. The Mission will be last to drop from his nerveless fingers.

As I stand here this pleasant afternoon, looking up at the old chapel,—its ragged senility contrasting with the smart spring sunshine, its two gouty pillars with the plaster dropping away like tattered bandages, its rayless windows, its crumbling entrances, the leper spots on its whitewashed wall eating through the dark adobe,—I give the poor old mendicant but a few years longer to sit by the highway and ask alms in the names of the blessed saints. Already the vicinity is haunted with the shadow of its dissolution. The shriek of the locomotive discords with the Angelus bell. An Episcopal church, of a green Gothic type, with massive buttresses of Oregon pine, even now mocks its hoary age with imitation and supplants it with a sham. Vain, alas! were those rural accessories, the nurseries and market-gardens, that once gathered about its walls and resisted civic encroachment. They too are passing away. Even those queer little adobe buildings with tiled roofs like longitudinal slips of cinnamon, and walled enclosures sacredly guarding a few bullock horns and strips of hide. I look in vain for the half-reclaimed Mexican, whose respectability stopped at his waist, and whose red sash under his vest was the utter undoing of his black broadcloth. I miss, too, those black-haired women, with swaying unstable busts, whose dresses were always unseasonable in texture and pattern; whose wearing of a shawl was a terrible awakening from the poetic dream of the Spanish mantilla. Traces of another nationality are visible. The railroad "navvy" has built his shanty near the chapel and smokes his pipe in the Posada. Gutturals have taken the place of linguals and sibilants. I miss the half-chanted, half-drawled cadences that used to mingle with the cheery "All aboard" of the stage-driver, in those good old days when the stages ran hourly to the Mission, and a trip thither was an excursion. At the very gates of the temple, in the place of those "who sell doves for sacrifice," a vender of mechanical spiders has halted with his unhallowed wares. Even the old Padre—last type of the missionary, and descendant of the good Junipero—I cannot find today; in his stead a light-haired Celt is reading a lesson from a Vulgate that is wonderfully replete with double r's. Gentle priest, in thy R-isons, let the stranger and heretic be remembered.

I open a little gate and enter the Mission churchyard. There is no change here, though perhaps the graves lie closer together. A willow-tree growing beside the deep brown wall has burst into tufted plumes in the fulness of spring. The tall grass blades over each mound show a strange quickening of the soil below. It is pleasanter here than on the bleak mountain seaward, where distracting winds continually bring the strife and turmoil of the ocean. The Mission hills lovingly embrace the little cemetery, whose decorative taste is less ostentatious. The foreign flavor is strong; here are never-failing garlands of "immortelles," with their sepulchral spicery; here are little cheap medallions of pewter, with the adornment of three black tears, that would look like the three of clubs, but that the simple humility of the inscription counterbalances all sense of the ridiculous. Here are children's graves with guardian angels of great specific gravity; but here, too, are the little one's toys in a glass case beside them. Here is the average quantity of execrable original verses; but one stanza—over a sailor's grave—is striking, for it expresses a hope of salvation through the "Lord High Admiral Christ!" Over the foreign graves there is a notable lack of scriptural quotation, and an increase, if I may say it, of humanity and tenderness. I cannot help thinking that too many of my countrymen are influenced by a morbid desire to make a practical point of this occasion, and are too apt hastily to crowd a whole life of omission into the culminating act. But when I see the grey "immortelles" crowning a tombstone, I know I shall find the mysteries of the resurrection shown rather in symbols, and only the love taught in His new commandment left for the graphic touch. But "they manage these things better in France."

THE MISSION DOLORES CHURCH

As it was in the days before its rehabilitation.

During my purposeless ramble the sun has been steadily climbing the brown wall of the church, and the air seems to grow cold and raw. The bright green dies out of the grass and the rich bronze comes down from the wall. The willow-tree seems half inclined to doff its plumes, and wears the dejected air of a broken faith and violated trust. The spice of the "immortelles" mixes with the incense that steals through the open window. Within, the barbaric gilt and crimson look cold and cheap in this searching air; by this light the church certainly is old and ugly. I cannot help wondering whether the old Fathers, if they ever revisit the scene of their former labors, in their larger comprehensions view with regret the impending change, or mourn over the day when the Mission Dolores shall appropriately come to grief?

The Spectator

Two Viewpoints

The other day Mayor Taylor while aerating his whiskers in the municipal auto attracted the attention of two laborers who were repairing a small strip of Larkin street.

"That's his 'On'rr th' May'r," said one of them.

"What th' hell do I care," said the other.

A few minutes later the Mayor again passed in the municipal auto.

He's a pur-rty industhryus man," said the first speaker; "here he is again; sure it's examnin' th' wur-rk he is."

"G'wan wid you!" said the second speaker, "it's lost he is."

Bartenders and Methodists

The Rev. C. F. Reid, D. D., of Oakland has been scandalized by the discovery that in San Francisco there are more than two bartenders for every Methodist. This overwhelming preponderance of the ministers of Dionysus in our midst is regarded by the Oakland divine as prima facie evidence of our utter and hopeless demoralization. But his judgment is not beyond gainsaying. Dr. Reid is the professional representative of one of the innumerable jarring Christian sects, and as such he has no sympathy with the religion of the son of Jupiter and Semele, under whose benign influence a very high degree of culture was reached on the shores of the Egean sea some centuries ago. As Dionysus enjoyed the reputation of being a promoter of civilization and a lover of peace perhaps Dr. Reid takes too pessimistic a view of the circumstance that while we have only eighteen churches consecrated to the greater glory of the Methodist deity there are eighteen hundred temples dedicated to the worship of dear old Bacchus. I am not partial to bartenders, but I have known some that were wonderfully facile in the art of attending to their own business, and at the same time delightfully proficient in their professional ministrations. Having no difficulty in holding their congregations they never went abroad uttering lamentations and depressing the spirits of their fellow men with mournful jeremiads. On the other hand I have known men of good parts in the Methodist ministry whose zeal and charity I much admired, but I have never deemed the spread of Methodism essential to the advancement of civilization. On the contrary I have been inclined to acquiesce in the views of one Matthew Arnold, an illustrious apostle of sweetness and light, who accounted for the predominance of philistinism in this country on the theory that the population comprised so large a percentage of the disciples of John Wesley whom he characterized as a man of second-rate intellect. Perhaps if Matthew Arnold had heard that bartenders outnumbered Methodists in San Francisco he would have concluded that this was the most cultured city in the United States.

The Awful Ha Ha of Paganism

The Rev. C. F. Reid believes that he has discovered what the matter is with San Francisco, and he has communicated the pleasing intelligence to the Nashville Christian Advocate. The Rev. C. F. Reid is not among my acquaintances, but I judge from what he has written for the Christian Advocate that he is a typical Oakland reformer consumed with a passion to set things right in this incorrigible city, in accordance with formulas invented in Berkeley and approved by the enlightened press of the remote interior. Nowhere is there less known of what ails us and of what is good for us than right in the heart of the metropolis. According to the critical Oakland divine we are suffering from godlessness. Not only has the Church failed to keep pace with the work of rebuilding, but it "shows few signs of even attempting to do so on a scale anything like adequate." While the population has grown apace "the protestant membership of the city has actually diminished rather than increased." There are "only 9,747 members of the evangelical churches in an American city of 400,000 people, not quite 1 in 40." Though a broad-minded Christian Dr. Reid does not deign to take cognizance of the 75,000 people who attend Christian churches that are not of the evangelical brand; nor does he take into consideration the moral influence that emanates from the synagogues of the Jews. One of the signs of the times by which his soul is anguished is that which he discerns in the Sabbath rush of young people "to the ferries and the railway stations where they are flocking by thousands to the parks and hills across the bay and the pleasure resorts thickly scattered down the peninsula." Apparently it has never occurred to him that there are Christians who are restrained neither by dogma nor rules of discipline from rational and decent enjoyment of the Sabbath. To him it is obvious that "the Church stands arrested in San Francisco"; nay, that "it is in a retreat that threatens to become a rout before a careless paganism that laughs at her confusion."

A Remedy

Fortunately Dr. Reid has a sure cure for our moral degradation. "We must reverse our methods," he says, "and forget the traditions that have led us to defeat." It appears that the Christian churches with which Dr.

Reid is acquainted, have been trying to propagate Christianity by means of a "dim religious light sifting through stained glass." He advises that this tomfoolery be abandoned; that no more churches be reared for dim religious light effects, but that instead we should build "substantial young people's church-houses, where the

EMPEROR NORTON

After Portola and long before Queen Vergilia was born came Norton I, a fantastic personage whose counterfeit presentment is all that remains to remind us of the rollicking days of old when private and public citizens yielded tribute to a madman, indulging him in the hallucination that San Francisco was the seat of his vast empire.

best conditions of home life can be provided." He exclaims: "Let us rub from our banners the theological dogmas hard to understand, and in their places write large and luminous: 'We live to minister.'" From this it might be inferred that D.r Reid is about to launch another sect, one designed to substitute "church-houses" for flats and apartment-houses, which, he says, are largely responsible for the ungodliness of us, since as a consequence of the lure of the flat and the thrall of the apartment-house, there is a great lack of home life in San Francisco, "and the children are largely reared on the streets." What a beautiful, vivid and faithful picture of San Francisco has been drawn by the veracious Oakland divine! Of course it was not his purpose to explain the failure of the Graft Prosecution. But how familiar is the ring of his sentiments!

Another Local Story Teller

San Francisco has sent forth for the conquest of the east so many able fictionists, newspapermen and other wielders of the pen, that the pride which is felt locally in our successful literary men is not in need of stimulation. Yet it is always a pleasure to record a new comer, particularly when his name is not so well known as to proclaim him at once a native of this city. I suppose that only a small proportion of those who were thrilled by a story entitled "A Little Matter of Salvage" in a recent issue of the Saturday Evening Post knew that the author, Peter B. Kyne, was a San Franciscan. Not only is this the fact but what is really surprising, this was the first bit of fiction which the young writer ever sent east for the judgment of an editor. Young Kyne inked his maiden pen in a few stories published in the "Blue Mule" that cavorted in our midst some time ago but it was not until quite recently that he plucked up sufficient courage to storm the editoral sancta of the Atlantic Coast. His first attempt brought an acceptance and a handsome check from the Saturday Evening Post and was followed by a letter asking for more stories. So Kyne has landed and landed big, for the Post is the goal of all short story writers. His first story, by the way, has excited a great deal of local interest entirely aside from its authorship. Men who know their waterfront tell me that the principal incidents and characters are quite easily identified. One of these tells me that the story is based with little change on the towage of the Austrian collier Maria by the steam schooner Iaqua. He says that the old man Hickman of the story is Mr. Higgins of the firm of Higgins and Collins, that young Hickman is young Carson of Dolbeer and Carson, that "Doughface" Johnson, another character, is quite well known by that name, that the engineer of the story is old Axel Smith, formerly of the Iaqua and that McNaughton, the hero of the yarn, is captain Tom Gunderson of the steamer Helen P. Drew. My informant may or may not be correct but certainly the story cannot lack for local color if its characters suggest well known men of the sea. Kyne by the way used to be with Dolbeer and Carson and should know the life of which he writes so stirringly.

Herrin to Retire

I notice that the daily papers have recently been making some mystery of the whereabouts of William F. Herrin, chief counsel for the Southern Pacific Company, and wondering why he has not returned to this city for the current political campaign. Newspaper references to Herrin are usually clouded with erroneous statements for the reason that his position at the head of the republican political machine has caused him to eschew publicity and has driven city editors very frequently to the exercise of their imaginations. Herrin is a man of too many big concerns to take a deep interest in a municipal campaign, and the fight will have to get along without his encouragement. I am credibly informed from New York sources that Herrin is contemplating retirement from the active duties of his position with the Southern Pacific and plans to spend his time among his books and friends. Herrin has been a hard worker all his life and the political game has tired him completely. He has acquired a lively distaste for the constant bickerings of politicians avid of petty power and my information is that he will be greatly relieved when he takes his last leave of it all. The death of Harriman has no doubt had much to do with this determination, for the great manipulator thought very highly of Herrin's abilities and kept him in harness. More than once during Harriman's reign Herrin refused a vice-presidency in the road and now it looks as though he will soon sever his connection with the law department and the political bureau.

The Rebuking of a Critic

Every great poet has his worshipers who are intolerant of criticism that imputes imperfections to his verse. Algernon Charles Swinburne is no exception. Alice Meynell recently wrote a criticism of Swinburne for the Dublin Review in which she pronounces him "a great poet with little intellect and paltry degree of sincerity, and rachitic passion, and tumid fancy." This may be an unjust estimate of Swinburne, but it is not Mrs. Meynell's alone. Being Mrs. Meynell's, however, it is entitled to respectful attention, for Mrs. Meynell is herself a great poet and no mean critic. Her literary ability and her intellectual honesty are recognized by the very highest of English authorities, but among the puny, half-baked critics of this country she is almost unknown, and in their ignorance they have assumed that she is deserving of nothing more than wholesale denunciation for presuming to challenge Swinburne's claim to companionship with the world's greatest singers. Unable to discuss intelligently the questions upon which she has expatiated they make vituperation supply the place of argument and flatter themselves that they have demonstrated that there is no room for controversy. The most intemperate of these Swinburne worshipers is one Royall Convers, who has taken up his frail cudgel in defense of the poet and flourished it with great ferocity in Harper's Weekly. In his opinion Allice Meynell is a bigoted Catholic, "a little thing," he calls her, "who has slavered venomous froth over Swinburne," because "he hated the temporal papacy." This gallant critic vindicates the calmness of his superior judgment by describing Alice Meynell as "a virago," "a pedant" and "a shrew." In all of which apparently George Harvey, the editor of Harper's concurs. He tells us that Alice Meynell "is a Catholic convert, and, as such, the narrowest, most relentless kind of critic."

The Swinburne Temperament

Swinburne's defenders are apparently of the temperament for which the poet himself was unfortunately distinguished. A great poet Swinburne certainly was, but that he was not a man of well disciplined mind, on the contrary, that he was a dogmatist of the most rabid type, one may learn from his essays. So little was there in him of the profoundly, calmly philosophic that he was noted for the intolerance and acrimony of his style in dealing with an adversary. Those unhappy persons who failed to share his passion for Victor Hugo's poetry were described as "bogwater," "toads," "centipedes," "polecats," "vampires" and numerous other species of vermin. He always spoke with inveterate contempt of those whose opinions in questions of taste differed from his own, but his arguments in support of his views were far from irrefutable. And these very arguments, by the way, bear out Mrs. Meynell's criticism since it is evident from them that Swinburne was more in love with the mechanical symmetries of art than anything else. In other words he admired display more than effect. "The worth of a poem," he said, "has nothing to do with its moral meaning or design; the only absolute duty of art is the duty she owes to herself." Above all things a lover of technique, he admired Victor Hugo not so much for his thoughts as for the ingenuity and invention he displayed in the manipulation of vast ideas.

Mrs. Meynell's Art

To assume that Alice Meynell's religious convictions influenced her opinion of Swinburne is, I take it, hardly fair. Indeed in the very article against which Convers so bitterly declaims there is proof that as a critic Mrs. Meynell is aloof from religious prejudice. But before examining her criticism let us first consider Mrs. Meynell's qualifications as a critic and inquire as to whether her standing in the literary world does not entitle her to respectful attention notwithstanding her devotion to the Catholic church. In pursuing this inquiry perhaps we may learn that the charge made against Mrs. Meynell by Convers and Harvey is more easily to be established in their case. Mrs. Meynell is a contributor to most of the highest class secular literary magizines of England. The Saturday Review which is not a Catholic journal publishes her poetry and regards her as one of England's most gifted essayists. From the beginning of her career her work received the most unreserved praise of English critics. Ruskin who can hardly be suspected of a passion for the papacy said that some of her poems "were among the finest things I have yet seen or felt in modern verse." George Meredith said that "to the metrical themes attempted by her she brings emotion, sincerity, together with an exquisite play upon our finer chords quite her own, not to be heard from another. Some of her lines have the living tremor in them." Coventry Patmore describes her work as bearing the "hall mark of genius, namely, the marriage of masculine force of insight with feminine grace and tact of expression." William Sharp said of one of her sonnets called "Renouncement" that he knew of nothing more noble or more beautiful. Of this same sonnet William Rossetti said: "It is one of the three finest sonnets ever written by women." This is the sonnet:

I must not think of thee; and, tired yet strong,
I shun the thought that lurks in all delight—
The thought of thee—and in the blue Heaven's height
And in the sweetest passage of a song.
Oh, just beyond the fairest thoughts that throng
This breast, the thought of thee waits, hidden yet bright;
But it must never, never come in sight;
I must stop short of thee the whole day long.
But when sleep comes to close each difficult day,
When night gives pause to the long watch I keep,
And all my bonds I needs must loose apart,
Must doff my will as raiment laid away—
With the first dream that comes with the first sleep
I run, I run, I am gathered to thy heart.

Let us take another sample of the handiwork of this gifted woman who has been pronounced "a virago" and

"a noxious beast" in the chaste columns of Harper's Weekly. Here is a poem entitled "The Modern Poet":

I come from nothing; but from where
Come the undying thoughts I bear?
  Down, through long links of death and birth,
  From the past poets of the earth.
My immortality is there.

I am like the blossom of an hour.
But long, long vanished sun and shower
  Awoke my breath i' the young world's air.
  I tracked the past back everywhere
Through seed and flower, and seed and flower.

Or I am like a stream that flows
Full of the cold springs that arose
  In the morning lands, in distant hills;
  And down the plain my channel fills
With melting of forgotten snows.

Voices I have not heard possessed
My own fresh songs; my thoughts are blessed
  With relics of the far unknown;
  And mixed with memories not my own
The sweet streams throng into my breast.

Before this life began to be,
The happy songs that wake in me
  Woke long ago, and far apart
  Heavily on this little heart
Presses this immortality.

From the foregoing it must be evident enough that Alice Meynell is at least a poet and not altogether incompetent to discuss poetry.

A Poet's Defects

Now as to Mrs. Meynell's criticism of Swinburne: much of what she says of him has been said so often that it is absolutely trite. Mrs. Meynell admits that Swinburne is a great poet, but she argues that he was not a man of great intellect. Now this is precisely what has been said of Swinburne over and over again. It was once said of him by the Edinburgh Review in exactly these words: "Never have such bountifulness of imagination, such mastery of the music of verse been linked with such poverty of genuinely impassioned thought." One of Mrs. Meynell's objections to Swinburne is that he hated God, and she attributes the failure of much of his poetry to his feeble conceptions of the deity. Again I quote from the Edinburg Review to show that even Protestants entertained the same view: "His poetry is marked by an absence of faith; a weird gloom of fatalism wraps the classic stateliness of his best verse. By faith is not meant religious belief compact of formulas, but a moral principle underlying and informing life and action whether it be in liberty or virtue; faith such as made Rousseau great, and Goethe and Shelley and Carlyle and Victor Hugo. The curse of moral incompleteness that clove to Byron has fallen with a double portion of his passion and power on the poet of Dolores and Faustine." The fact is that frequently throughout his career Swinburne was attacked not on the ground of art but of morality. It was because he walked the gloomy path of a hopeless fatalism and because also of his profanity and excess of sensuous feeling that Queen Victoria, who was never suspected of being partial to Rome, passed him by at the death of Tennyson and appointed Alfred Austin Poet Laureate.

The Point of Her Criticism

If, as George Harvey believes, Alice Meynell is prejudiced against Swinburne on account of her religious convictions then she should also be suspected of the same bigoted attitude toward Milton than whom no poet was ever more intolerant of "priestcraft." But we learn from her criticism of Swinburne that one of her objections to his poetry is that it betrays an idea of Milton that is too illusory. Her criticism in the main, however, has nothing to do with religious questions; it deals with the shallowness of Swinburne's mind, despite which, she acknowledges, he wrote much true and beautiful poetry.

The point upon which she insists is that he accepted the weak philosophy of others; that he was influenced by the inferior work of other poets and even by the prejudices of the mob. It was the mob she thinks that inspired his contempt for the Boers, who, by the way, despite their well known antipathy for the Catholic Church, appear to have the sympathy and admiration of Mrs. Meynell.

Sentimental Jamie's Divorce

I am sorry for James M. Barrie, sorry from the inmost heart of me, and at the same time, I must admit, disillusioned. There are men whom we come to know through their public work or their writings to whom we never dream of attributing the weaknesses from which the common run of men are never free. In this class I had placed the author of Peter Pan, illogically, sentimentally, perhaps, yet still with the approbation of an intuitive process which has been demoralized by the news that he is to divorce his wife and take unto himself as a second helpmeet the "pink pajama girl." Of Barrie's marital felicity or infelicity I of course know nothing and wish to know nothing. When in the delicious "My Lady Nicotine" I heard him say—all that Barrie writes has the rare charm of seeming to be addressed in conversation to his reader—"My present state is so happy that I can only look back with wonder at my hesitation to enter upon it," I took it as a matter of course that he was speaking of his own marriage and being an inveterate devotee of the weed myself, I was glad that so fine a literary craftsman was so happy in his married life that he could bear to forego smoking. That my feeling was not altogether sentimental I am prepared to show if necessary by reference to Barrie's works, fictional and dramatic, in which he has ever exhibited a wonderful insight into the feminine character. How could one more satisfactorily account for this insight than by the supposition that he had made a union of true sympathy? And now it seems that there are to be unpleasant divorce proceedings and that Barrie has named a co-respondent. With all this I would have no quarrel but the announcement immediately following that Barrie is to wed Pauline Chase I cannot stomach. Does a true-hearted gentleman assuage the agony of putting from him the woman who bears his name by preparing for an alliance with another? I think not and that is why I will be disillusioned in Barrie if the story prove true. Pauline Chase has played Peter Pan in London for several seasons with great success and no doubt has been thrown into intimate association with the playwright. The whole thing has too much the appearance of one of those miserable cases of what is vulgarly called "affinity" to suit my taste. I am disposed to sympathize with the first Mrs. Barrie and to suspect that she has learned "what every woman knows," that man is an unstable creature of clay at best and that fidelity is rarely in him. Too bad that Margaret Ogilvy is not alive to tell her son what she thinks of this scandal.

An Uncertainty That Plagues

Speaking of Hetch-Hetchy the Boughten Bulletin asks "Is there never to be an end of the matter? Are the people never to feel secure?" These are questions that ought to have been asked before the people voted for the expenditure of money for the purchase of land in the Hetch-Hetchy Valley. They were questions that suggested themselves to the minds of intelligent men who regarded it as a species of imbecility for the people to assume that they would be able to bulldoze the authorities at Washington for all time, and upon this fatuous assumption to hazard a large sum of money. But it was useless to protest against the Hon. James D. Phelan's pet folly, or even to suggest that we should acquire a cloudless title and pursue a business policy in the preliminary steps toward the goal of our desires. The dear, unsophisticated general had been persuaded that their interests were in good hands, the hands of their warmest, most passionate and zealous friends, and that they should regard all objectors as minions of the Spring Valley Water Company.

The John Muir Scare

During the past week the obsession has been relaxing perceptibly. It has been dawning on the perceptions of people of the dullest intellectuals that our city officials have involved us in something of the nature of embarrassment. It is clear that the champions of Hetch-Hetchy have been in a state of panic. Despite the assurances that they have been giving us of the stability and solidity of our position, the mere circumstance that John Muir had been chosen as the guide and companion of President Taft and Secretary Ballinger on the Yosemite trails filled them with nervous apprehension and alarm. What an awful hullabaloo they have been making about Muir! They seem to regard that old nature lover as a sort of cross between a wizard and a witch, a person skilled in the black art, and capable of exercising spells and charms that are absolutely irresistible. They are sure that Ballinger will succumb to Muir's supernatural powers and they have suggested, begged and pleaded that the Secretary be induced to safeguard himself against the witcheries of the bad old scientist. Of course they have had in mind as a prophylactic, or at least as an offset, the Hon. James D. Phelan, whose Machiavellian principles of persuasion they would match against the mysterious powers of the most accomplished exponent of the necromantic art. But neither President Taft nor Secretary Ballinger would consent to the companionship of Phelan. That is why we must depend entirely on the Secretary.

Hearst and Gaynor

America's premier political acrobat, the greatest ground and lofty tumbler the world has ever seen in the field of politics, surpassed all his previous efforts the other day by turning a somersault so altitudinous that it almost amounted to an achievement in aviation. I allude of course to the vertiginous triumph of the Hon. William R. Hearst. In the Examiner of October 6 Mr. Hearst was quoted as follows:

"I believe that Judge Gaynor is a good man and would make a good Mayor, but I am sincerely sorry that Tammany is to be allowed to use his good name as a cloak for another raid upon this pillaged city.

"Withal I am for Judge Gaynor, but not for Tammany. I think the independents should do their best to elect Judge Gaynor and defeat Tammany Hall."

It took Mr. Hearst nearly a whole week to change his opinion of Judge Gaynor. He did not change it until it occurred to him that in a three cornered fight he might be able to beat the Tammy candidate.

Sneers at His Own Accomplice

Judge Gaynor says that six months ago Mr. Hearst urged him to run for Mayor "on any ticket" and pledged his support. "If Judge Gaynor," says Mr. Hearst, "has stated that I promised to support him under any and all circumstances and upon any and all tickets he states what is positively untrue." Judge Gaynor has not stated anything of the kind as Mr. Hearst must know if he reads his own papers, but evidently it serves the great Tribune's purpose to misquote his adversary. There are few controversialists more adroit or dexterous than Mr. Hearst in the dialectic art of adopting propositions to the subtle processes of his logic. But even this distinguished tactician will find it somewhat difficult to extricate himself from the awkward position into which he inadvertently maneuvered. It appears that when he was urging Judge Gaynor to run for Mayor he took one of his editors into his confidence, and this editor's recollection of certain questions at issue is not in harmony with his employer's. Furthermore he does not hesitate to affirm the truth of what Judge Gaynor has said. Intent upon rendering this editor's testimony negligible Mr. Hearst attempts to overwhelm him with obloquy by disclosing his responsibility for the most shocking features of the New York Journal's Sunday Supplement. But this disclosure does not improve Mr. Hearst's position, since we know that the editor whom he derides and reprobates was but a short time ago his confidential agent in his dealings with Gaynor.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy.

Wheat: Interests which sold wheat on the well-founded idea of a large total crop and the natural deduction that the United States was an exporting country and was being undersold by Canada and Russia, have been tired out waiting the full development of their theory, and thus have covered their lines. The winter wheat farmers, busy in putting their ground into shape, and influenced by success in holding their crop, have temporarily defeated immediate success to the short seller. A glance ahead, however, shows likelihood of milling and reserve holes being filled up. Chicago is becoming a spring wheat market and going into the winter with a fair stock and only an export demand will allow maintaining the dollar level.

Corn: About all the bull news is out in corn. The report is not as bullish as a first glance would allow. Reserves of old corn are large, consumptive demand outside of commercial usage delayed and decreased on account of small cattle and hog feed and very late pasture being available.

Cotton: Predictions and precedent have been shattered during the past few weeks, and the sanguine hopes of many that the market would decline under the weight of the movement, regardless of the underlying conditions, have all but passed away. It has been so, largely because of the alertness of speculation, which, with its keen scent and quick action, realized the abnormal conditions existing, viz.: scant supply and record consumption, and has bought in advance of legitimate demand, forestalled the spinner, and thereby saved untold millions to the growers. If the south ever needed a convincing illustration of the benefits of a broad market, in which all of the world can participate with ease and facility when it once became satisfied as to prospective values, it should study closely and remember always the lesson now being taught by the figures of the future boards. Spinners, more particularly American, have refrained to their utmost from making purchases in the hope that the pressure of farmers to sell would throw the balance their way, when their supply, as usual, could be secured and prices then marked up. Speculation, however, has stepped in, taken the market out of their hands, and, incidentally, put them in a quandary. Short time is already being advocated, but meets with little substantial support with general trade conditions, headed by iron and steel, booming as they are. Spinners' takings past week were 242,166 bales against 216,667 last year; total to date 1,088,884 bales against 1,040,699 which is the largest on record. Sellings agents and manufacturers are gradually placing cotton goods on a parity with the increased cost of cotton. Advances of ¾ to 1 cent per yard in the price of cloths and print goods were made only a few days ago, which is significant when we stop to consider that this slight advance is equivalent to 3 to 5 cents a pound in raw cotton. The market during the week has developed erratic traits, due in the main no doubt to the unusual level of values at this season. The smallest influence is magnified many times, and rumors are as potent for bad or good as truths. Many wild reports as to the extent of storm damage have been disproved since last week and it now appears that the area seriously affected was limited to Louisiana and parts of Mississippi. Rains were quite general outside of those States, but probably did more good than harm, as the plant is said to be still blooming in parts of Texas with a chance of making with a late frost. The Carolinas and Georgia have good normal crops, while Alabama and Tennessee could scarcely be termed fair; Mississippi's prospect is distressing, while Louisiana's must be put down as a disaster. Prudence advises that the market be not forced higher until trade fully adjusts itself to the new levels, and we therefore look for a scalping market for the present with probably an upward tendency.

Stocks: The considerable decline in steel in the recent week has been caused chiefly by a change of sentiment among certain interests of sufficient magnitude to cause some very heavy sales of the stock, and while it is admitted that the buying on the decline of seven or eight points has been of the best and probably on a scale down, the sales have been of such volume that it has materially unsettled values of stocks generally and created a growing bear sentiment. There is nothing illogical in the setback of steel or the market at the present period. Steel has had an almost uninterrupted advance of fifty points and a decline at this season when money rates are bound to harden and bank reserves are protected, is perfectly natural, but as to the extent of this decline, that depends on the powerful banking interests that have stood sponsor for this corporation and its price movements since its organization. There is nothing in the money situation that apparently warrants worry in the future, as the return of crop funds is not far off and the drain of cash from this center will cease. The Government crop report on the 8th inst., while showing a small deterioration in corn, indicated a larger wheat yield. There will be good average crops, hence this is not a factor in securities except as a most favorable element for the future. In summarizing, stocks have been high with a small distribution in the hands of the public, and with the money outlook temporarily clouded. It seems a certainty that securities will be allowed to drift for the time being and this drift will be to a somewhat lower level, or until speculative accounts are well cleaned up. The starting of another bull period before thirty days have expired is not improbable, though likely from a lower level. In the interim, we should strongly advise the utmost conservatism and the purchase of stocks on extreme weakness for turns only.

Local Securities: The market for local stocks and bonds has been rather quiet for the past week or so and the chief interest has centered in Telephone common. It is now an established fact that New York has become the barometer for this stock and the trend of our local market has been governed by quotations from the east. While these shares have lately shown an irregular tone, the general trend has been downward and at the present writing, the stock shows no signs of a brace. The activity of Pacific Gas and Electric stocks, both here and in New York, has been greatly reduced and while no great movement one way or the other, has been noticed, it is encouraging to see these stocks holding their own. Associated Oil has experienced some excellent buying, a great deal for Los Angeles account, and has some little advance. Alaska Packers has been practically neglected and an absence of orders on it has caused a temporary weakness. Spring Valley Water and Hawaiian sugar shares continue dull but firm. Bank of California has been well supported at around $405. Bond dealings continue to show a demand for issues that represent the Southern California street railway and power issues and the new corporation bonds of the Los Angeles Gas and Electric Company are finding ready buyers in this market. Of our home bonds, Spring Valley Water 4s, Telephone 5s, California Gas and Electric 5s and United Railroads 4s have all had a certain amount of demand at steady if not higher prices. While a temporary squeeze may come at any time in the world's money markets, which will certainly have a quieting effect on California as well as other groups of securities, I certainly feel that the local list will be benefited by a momentary shakeout and will show up strong after this factor is removed.

Phelan and Katherine Elkins

I was not a little surprised as well as interested when a friend from Washington who visited in this city for a few days recently told me that James D. Phelan had been paying a great deal of attention to Miss Katherine Elkins during his last sojourn at the capital. My informant said that our bachelor millionaire had been most assiduously devoted to the beautiful young woman whose romance with the Duke d'Abruzzi has been a topic of international journalism during the past year, and that the young lady who may yet marry into the royal family of Italy seemed very much pleased with his society. The news which I received does not warrant me in saying that Mr. Phelan has courageously attempted to put an end to d'Abruzzi's hopes by wooing Miss Elkins to matrimony, but the fact remains that he has been paying such conspicuous court that Washington society has commented on the matter and although he may have been merely attracted by the beauty and undoubted cleverness of Miss Elkins, the possibility of a more romantic outcome should never be overlooked. Mr. Phelan has been sought of many managing mamas and has seemed at times to tremble on the verge of marriage and while many now regard him as a confirmed bachelor, the lovewise know that such a species is non-existent among millionaires. So who knows what may happen?

Miss Elkins' Admirers

If there should really be a romance at the bottom of the interesting bit of news brought to me by my Washington friend, there would be a deal of unhappiness wrought thereby in high places. Miss Elkins, besides having one of the wealthiest papas in the United States Senate and a grandfather who has almost as many millions as years, boasts an entourage of sighing swains that would not be beneath the admiration of a maiden queen. Of course her two most persistent suitors are the Italian duke who climbs the lofty Himalayas in the intervals of his furious courtship and "Billy" Hitt, the young Washington millionaire whose mother has recently built a marble mansion in Dupont circle which many think will be the future home of Miss Elkins. There are many more in the young lady's train and if San Francisco is to add another in the person of Mr. Phelan, certainly it will be conceded that by wealth and social position he is fitted to cope with all comers.

Phelan's Many Romances

Never was there a San Francisco millionaire whom dame rumor has so persistently endeavored to fit to a romantic marriage. As I glance back over the past few years any number of names which have been linked with Mr. Phelan's come into my mind. Mary Belle Gwin, before she became Mrs. James Follis, was one of the young women to whom he paid serious attention. At one time the devotion of the millionaire to Miss Jennie Blair, a belle of perennial popularity, was the chief topic of conversation among the bavardes but Miss Blair is still an uncompromising bachelor maid and Mr. Phelan is yet unmarried. Once too when Miss Ada Sullivan, the sister of Frank J. Sullivan, traveled abroad in the same party with Phelan, the tabbies coupled their names in a matrimonial way. That rumor blossomed for a long time, as did the story of Mrs. McLean Martin's admiration for the millionaire. It may be owing to Phelan's fondness for music or it may have been a more romantic feeling which caused him to seek the society of Sibyl Sanderson, Emma Eames and Zelie de Lussan.

When He Chaperoned Mrs. Gilman-Corey

No list of Phelan's romantic experiences would be complete which omitted mention of Mabel Gilman, the Mills College girl who passed from the blaze of the footlights to the lurid glare of Pittsburg society by way of a marriage with Corey, the steel magnate. Phelan had a tenderness for Mabel which died the death about the time that that spectacular young woman gave out for publication the love letters addressed to her by the Prince of Siam. I am reminded by this churning of old gossip of an experience Phelan had with the actress in London. One evening at the hotel where she was stopping with her mother, the elder lady said to Phelan: "Mr. Phelan, I am going to give you a privilege which no man has ever had. I am going to allow you to accompany Mabel in a carriage alone to the theatre. It will be the first time she was ever alone with a man." Mr. Phelan availed himself of the opportunity to enjoy this great favor and during the trip he doubtless felt as one might who had been selected to guard a vestal virgin. Afterwards when he learned that the demure Mabel was enjoying a love affair with a Mongolian princelet it probably occurred to him that he was lucky that a sensational account of his carriage trip was not cabled to the American press.

Expressions of the Artistic Temperament

When Frederick Macmonnies, the famous American sculptor, separated from his wife in Paris some time ago, it was intimated that he had fallen in love with the daughter of Senator Jones of Nevada, a lady very well known in this city. Now it turns out that it was Mrs. Macmonnies whose love had grown cold. Her engagement to Will H. Low, a New York artist, has been announced. It is said that Macmonnies and his wife parted with not the slightest tinge of ill-feeling, and that the circumstances of the case are similar to those attending the separation of the Ruskins. It will be remembered that Ruskin's wife fell in love with his friend Millais the painter, and that he approved of the romance and generously gave the lady her freedom. Mrs. Ruskin became lady Millais, a leader of fashion and society. The readjustment of Richard Wagner's domestic affairs was somewhat more complex as he had a wife and the lady, a husband. When twenty-six Wagner married a beautiful opera singer, but a long period of poverty and her jealousy of his friendships with other women wore out their love. Although an excellent wife in her attention to his comfort, there was not much community of interest between them. "Now, honestly, is Richard such a great genius?" she asked after he had already written "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," and "Lohengrin." Finally they separated, and five years later she died. Cosima von Buelow was a daughter of Franz Liszt. Liszt was a champion of Wagner's genius, and for this reason Wagner's house was the objective point of the wedding journey of his daughter and Hans von Buelow. Wagner was charmed with the young couple, and after their three weeks' visit he said in a letter that he thought they were admirably mated. When he saw them several years later he did not think so. Wagner commiserated her on her husband's bad temper, and after the necessary divorce Wagner and she were married. They were ideally happy, and when Wagner died Cosima cut off her beautiful hair, which he had so greatly admired, and placed it under his head in the coffin. Those who are in a position to know say that without her tact Bayreuth would have remained an unfulfilled dream. Since his death she has been Bayreuth.

Mrs. Atherton to Write Two Plays

Gertrude Atherton, the gifted California novelist whose English triumphs have been attested by two such divergent authorities as Lord Northcliffe and the late George Meredith, will go to New York at the beginning of the year to write two plays for Mrs. Fiske. Mrs. Atherton has yet to venture her pen in the dramatic field but she has been so much importuned by Mrs. Fiske to do something for stage presentation that she has at last consented and will cross the country to be near the great actress who is to interpret her maiden dramatic efforts. After that Mrs. Atherton will depart for Europe again. The book on which Mrs. Atherton has been quietly engaged in this city is completed and will be published soon. It is the story of a great singer and is bound to excite adventitious interest among those who know of Mrs. Atherton's friendship for Miss Maude Fay and who will look for her portrait in the novel. Which reminds me that Mrs. Atherton has sent out cards for a reception in honor of Miss Fay in the grey room of the Fairmont on Monday afternoon. Those who have been bidden are delighted at the opportunity to meet the charming and handsome girl who has made such a brilliant European success in her difficult profession.

Mrs. Stevenson Buys a Haunted House

Mrs. Frank Norris and Mrs. Isobel Strong have taken possession of their new home near the Country Club in Santa Barbara. It is not far from "Stonehedge," the beautiful Montecito home of Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson which by the way has an interesting history. It had been unoccupied for a number of years when Mrs. Stevenson became its purchaser and was called "the house of mystery" owing to an unexplained tragedy which frightened possible tenants away. For several months in 1901 it was the home of a mysterious Mr. and Mrs. Hampsch and their secretary who lived in the strictest seclusion. Hampsch was supposed to have been an officer in the German army while it was rumored that Mrs. Hampsch was a countess closely related to the Kaiser who had incurred the displeasure of the royal family. She was a very beautiful young woman. One night she left the dinner table, stepped out on a balcony and killed herself with a revolver. The only reason given was that she had been suffering the tortures of neuralgia but other motives were alleged in the widespread comment which followed the tragedy. Hampsch returned to Germany, leaving the house empty and with the name of being haunted. Until Mrs. Stevenson took a fancy to it nobody would purchase it, but she has no superstitious fears and has made it a beautiful and comfortable abode.

Young Hill's Enthralment

This reminds me that those who never weary in the contemplation of a romance are very much interested in the devotion which young Hill is exhibiting for a very prominent young society girl who resides with her parents at the Fairmont. The young man's ardor for this vivacious brunette is as conspicuous as youthful ardor can be. The young lady however does not give him overmuch encouragement. She is an only daughter, has shown considerable dramatic talent in the recent society vaudevilles and besides, has other persistent admirers. One of them is the only son of a millionaire whose sisters are matrons of the Burlingame set. I have yet to observe any indication that she is thinking of exchanging the pleasant frivolities of society for the responsibilities of wedded bliss.

Ethel Crocker's Declaration

Although Miss Ethel Crocker shares the artistic tastes of her mother Mrs. Will Crocker, her attachment to the antique is tempered by a very pronounced appreciation of the comforts of modernity. All who have visited the Crocker home have admired the splendid collection of chairs which Mrs. Will Crocker has assembled from the treasure rooms of the old world. There are beautiful specimens of Chippendale and Louis Quinze and all the other sorts so dear to the hearts of collectors. But antiquity has its drawbacks and nearly all the chairs creak when they are sat upon. Miss Crocker has long been painfully aware of this and one day not long ago when one of the most dearly prized treasures groaned audibly beneath her, the noise got upon her nerves and she announced: "When I grow up and have a home of my own I shall furnish it entirely from Grand Rapids, Michigan."

Raphael Weil Coming Home

A rumor springing from some mysterious source has had it recently that Raphael Weil did not intend to return to this city but would spend his time abroad. I never attached much importance to the story and am glad now to contradict it positively. The favorite clubman will return to this city from Paris about the end of November and will once more add his lively wit to the entertainments of clubdom.

Wanrell's Spanish Concert

The music of Spain is but vaguely known in this country outside of "La Paloma" and the arias from Carmen, so the concert of Spanish music to be given in Dreamland Rink on October 21 by Signor Joaquin Wanrell should have an educational as well as a very decided artistic value. The fact that the concert will come in Portola week adds timeliness to its other attractions. Wanrell is becoming well known in this city and deservedly so; hence it seems likely that his Spanish concert will receive a good deal of recognition from our music-lovers. The choruses, led by professional singers, will include the patriotic "Gloria a Espana"; the gay "Ay que Risa"; "Honora a los Bravos"; "Las Galas de Cinca"; and the sentimental "El Primer Amor." Wanrell will render "La Partida" of Alvarez and "Los Ojos Negros" of Clave. The whole program is of high class.

Elder's Uncommercial Evening

There have been numerous evening openings downtown as the well known firms have returned to the shopping district, and opened their permanent homes for inspection but it has remained for Paul Elder's bookshop, already noted for its wide departure from conventional ways and methods, to plan an original and pleasing variation. After waiting until the establishment was thoroughly equipped and settled, cards were issued for "an uncommercial evening," with music, on October 15. This affair had a decided social flavor unusual even in smart establishments. A reception committee was named for each room that represents the firm's varied activities and the whole atmosphere of the place invited to a leisurely inspection of its treasures. The distinctive Gothic architecture of the book room is reminiscent of the monastic libraries where the treasures of the Middle Ages were garnered, and the old volumes, facsimiles of famous manuscripts, tooled bindings, and vellum covers, add to the illusion. The winding stairs lead not to oratory and refectory, but to complete changes of treatment, and consequently of mood. The teakwood room holds much to be studied in Oriental ware and embroidery placed in a most appropriate setting. The red room holds also its individual interest and leads on to the second floor where are the children's room, a distinctive feature of the Post street store before the fire, and the new art rooms displaying the modern crafts, prints and pictures. In the publishing rooms on the third floor is an exhibition that is perhaps the most notable expression of typographic art in America today.

Architectural League Exhibition

The entire basement of the Monadnock Building is being utilized for the exhibition that is to be given from October 19 to 31 by the Architectural League of the Pacific Coast, under the immediate direction of the San Francisco Architectural Club. This is the most ambitious affair of the kind ever undertaken on the Pacific Coast, and from all indications it will be a great success. The exhibition will include not only architectural drawings and models, but ornamentation, sculpture, terra cotta and tile work, stained glass and other products of the allied arts. Eastern architects have entered enthusiastically into the spirit of this exhibition, sending a large number of pieces of work. Nearly 100 have come from New York alone, twenty offices contributing. A number of exhibits have arrived from England. The Architectural League will holds its first annual convention during the time of the exhibition, which by the way is free to the public. Several prominent eastern architects are coming and they and the coast men will be extensively entertained by the local architects.

In the Social Spotlight

The death of Mrs. Willis Davis has caused several young ladies to withdraw from the winter's gaieties. Among them are Miss Dorothy Van Sicklen, Miss Mary Louise Foster and Miss Mina Van Bergen. The cards sent out by Miss Van Sicklen for a dancing party tonight at the Claremont Country Club have been recalled.

Mutuality of Interest

A modern public utility company is different from the police, the fire, the health and other municipal departments only in name, particular kind of service performed and legal incorporation. It is engaged in providing necessities which affect nearly all the people. It is no more interested in collecting its bills than the city government is interested in collecting taxes. Work and service must be paid for, whether the method be through taxation or any other.

The gas company is worthy of its hire just as much as the man who works for his income with muscle or brain. Both utility managers and the people are beginning to realize that there is only one sure way of GETTING a square deal, and that is by GIVING a square deal.

As a public servant, working for hire, a utility company has certain well-defined duties to the public. Unless it exerts every reasonableeffort to fulfill these duties it loses the right to employment and whatever privileges an efficient organization might expect to receive.

On the other hand the public has obligations to a utility company which labors to the best of its power to give adequate and reliable service at reasonable prices; to keep in advance of present demands in order that future needs may not suffer; to maintain itself in sound financial condition in order to secure the large amounts of capital necessary for improvements and extensions, and to secure this capital on the most favorable terms; to obtain the best engineering and technical skill in the conduct of the enterprise, and to increase the business done in order that the total compensation received may enable substantial reductions in the individual costs paid by consumers.

The first of these obligations is to recognize the fact that your interests are our interests and vice versa, and the second that you deal with us on a business basis and in a friendly spirit.

Do we ask too much?

Stalmaker of the United States Navy, at Del Monte during the week past. Mr. Fuller and Mr. Stalmaker spend considerable time on the golf links, and the entire party has taken many short excursions into the hills and along the coast drives.

Mr. and Mrs. Athole McBean who have been stopping with the William Mayo Newhalls since their return from their wedding tour abroad, will soon move into their new home in Steiner street.

Letters received during the week report the marriage of Miss Katherine Searle, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Searle of Alameda and Ensign George H. Laird, of the cruiser Cleveland. The marriage took place in Manila on Tuesday, October 5. The young couple left immediately for Japan where the groom is stationed.

A delightful card party of the week was that given by Mrs. H. C. Huffman on Tuesday at her beautiful home in Broadway.

Alden Wheeler, the son of Mr. and Mrs. William R. Wheeler, has just joined the stock company at the Alcazar Theatre.

Mr. and Mrs. Marshall Wallach and their daughter Miss Louise have taken quarters at the Gables in Clay street for the winter. Miss Louise Wallach will be one of the season's debutantes.

Mr. and Mrs. R. A. Holcombe who have been spending the summer at their attractive home in Belvedere, have closed it for the winter and have taken rooms at the Hotel Monroe in Sacramento street.

Dr. and Mrs. M. E. Grossman of Honolulu are at the St. Francis.

Mrs. John D. Tallant and Mrs. Kate G. Locke sailed from New York last Saturday for a tour abroad. Mrs. George Hellmann who accompanied her sister Mrs. Tallant to New York a few weeks ago, will start for her home in this city on October 20.

An interesting engagement in army circles is that of Miss Mary Cutter Lundeen, daughter of Col. and Mrs. Lundeen to First Lieut. Edwin E. Pritchett of the Field Artillery, now stationed at the Presidio. No date has been set for the wedding.

Stage

A Stock Yard Drama

"The Great John Ganton" possessed a sort of greatness which lends itself quite easily to stage presentation. He was the king of the Chicago stock-yards, a self-made millionaire with deep veneration for his maker, a bully to his children and to his employes, a hard-hitting old rascal when it was necessary to fight but with an abiding confidence in the power of the almighty dollar to settle disputes, a despiser of ways that were not his ways—in a word, the sort of captain of industry with whom recent dramatists and novelists have made us almost tediously acquainted. We know that Ganton possesses most of these characteristics because he never tires of telling about them. As for the more cheerful side of his character, that is brought home to us with similar directness. When he sends a tired stenographer to the country with a pass (in violation of the law) and two weeks' pay in advance, we are led to believe that the old bullyragger has a kind heart; and when he gives to charity in his wife's name the inference is unmistakable that he is unostentatiously good. Here we have a familiar time-worn character that almost runs in a groove like a piece of scenery. Of course it has been brightened here and there with modern touches, but once it has been presented in the first act, there is little doubt as to how it will develop through the remaining three. Speculation as to the outcome of the play is discouraged somewhat by the introduction of one or two incidents which are never completed; they help to fill the stage but are in nowise cogged to the other wheels on which the play revolves. As for the main incident, it is not overpoweringly interesting; the fight between obstinate father and obstinate son, the convenient romance between the obstinate son and the daughter of the man whom the obstinate father had ruined and accordingly hated; with the other elements of the formula utilized recently in plays like "The Lion and the Mouse" and stories like the Jack Spurlock series, but so far from novel that experienced dramatists and novelists have been working them out with their eyes shut since the Lord knows when. With this play George Fawcett who is enacting the great John Ganton at the Valencia works wonders. He spreads the fascination of his personality alike over the audience and the threadbare play and the two are brought to terms of a tolerable satisfaction. This is to accomplish a great deal but Fawcett is an actor of unusual capabilities in character roles and he succeeds in concealing those absurdities in the character of John Ganton which are fatally evident in retrospect and would be fatally evident in the presentation if the part were bungled. There is great power in some of Fawcett's scenes; twice particularly when Ganton chokes with rage and tries to articulate his denunciations and once when his heart gives out and he crumples and falls, the illusion of his acting is complete. Fawcett's treatment of the part wherever the dramatist has left him half a chance to lift it out of melodrama into real life, is tantalizing for it suggests what great powers he would bring to bear upon an adequate role. Miss Fanchon Campbell who plays the part of the young lady lion-tamer struggles dutifully with love-scenes that were written in rather remarkable key, no doubt to convey the commercial or Chicago idea of love-making; and when the times comes for her verbal onslaught on the king of the stock-yards she delivers her speech with gusto, completely flabbergasting the old gentleman. Surprise probably as much as shock brings the seizure which helps to make a happy ending plausible. It has become so much the stage fashion for young ladies to subdue ferocious captains of industry with mesmeric glances and a rain of words and tears that audiences seem to have lost all sense of the absurdity underlying the process. I'll wager George Fawcett sees the humor of the thing; I almost thought he winked at the dress circle when the gallery applauded.

—Edward F. O'Day.

Klein's Latest at the Van Ness

"The Third Degree," Charles Klein's latest play which comes to the Van Ness Monday night for two weeks, fresh from a run of seven months at the Hudson Theatre, New York, treats of certain conditions that exist in social life in New York together with the assuming powers by police that have never been conferred by law. The play has certain marked metaphysical features combined with the police that have never been conferred by law. The play instead of mental suggestion. The cast includes Paul Everton, Fernanda Eliscu, Margaret Drew, E. A. Eberle, A. H. Symons, Francis Bonn, Ralph Ramsay, H. H. Forseman and Alfred Moore.

The "Rose" Is Still Blooming

With drawing power undiminished "The Rose of the Rancho" will start on its second and final week in the Alcazar Monday evening. Since its initial presentation this season the Belasco-Tully play has filled the theatre at every performance and given thousands of people a foretaste of the Portola carnival. Among those who witnessed the Alcazar's production of "The Rose" last season was David Belasco and he pronounced it the most wonderful achievement ever attained in a stock theatre. Of Miss Barriscale's acting in the title part he was lavish in praise. If he were to see the present production he would marvel still more, for the performance becomes better with every repetition. As the Alcazar management has the exclusive right to present "The Rose of the Rancho" in California and will present it nowhere else than in San Francisco this season the city's guests during Portola week will undoubtedly take advantage of the opportunity to witness what many regard as the greatest play of California life that ever was staged.

Portola Week at the Orpheum

Portola week will be celebrated at the Orpheum. The theatre will be brilliantly illuminated and tastefully decorated within and without and the program to be presented next week will be an enjoyable incident of the coming festivities. George Bloomquest will appear in a sketch written for him by Victor H. Smalley called "Nerve." Mr. Bloomquest will be supported by Rubyn Thorpe, Earl D. Dwire and Thomas Broom. Eugene Howard and Willie Howard will present "The Messenger Boy and the Thespian." They are both good vocalists with a popular selection of songs. Martinettie and Sylvester, comedians who are often called "The Boys with the Chairs" will introduce a novelty in acrobatics entitled "An Attempt at Suicide." Balferini's Canine Tumblers will give an exhibition of animal sagacity. Next week will terminate the engagement of the Tuscany Troubadours, the Six Glinserettis and the German comedians Carlin and Clark. It will also be the last week of Valerie Bergere who will revive "Billie's First Love."

"Honeymoon Trail" at the Garrick

The stage of the Garrick will be in harmony with the outer world next week for the special Portola attraction at that house is full of life, color and beauty. This will be the first presentation here of "Honeymoon Trail," the musical comedy by Hough, Adams and Howard. Its locale is in Lower California and its Spanish coloring will harmonize with the festival spirit that will predominate for the coming week. The company of sixty includes a number of principals well known to local theatregoers. Bert Baker, the leading comedian, is said to be one of the best laugh-producers in musical comedy. Arline Bowling, Mabel Melvine and Maude Potter, the three leading women of the company, are said to be very capable artists and the chorus promises well in voice and looks. "The Time, the Place and the Girl" is to follow.

"The Ringmaster" at the Valencia

On Sunday night "The Ringmaster" will begin a limited engagement at the Valencia, coming direct from the Maxime Elliott Theatre, New York, with a big cast of metropolitan favorites. The comedy situations are excellent and the cast includes H. S. Northrup, a San Francisco favorite, Frederick Montague, an English actor, F. A. Yalvington, Alice Weeks, Harvey D. Crossman, John Watts, Francis Learned, Rosamond Carpentier, Clara Collman, Anna Lee and others well known to New York audiences. Matinees will be given on Wednesday and Saturday and during the run popular prices will prevail, from one dollar to twenty-five cents.

Portola Week at the Chutes

The biggest bill of the New Chutes season will open this Sunday and extend through Portola week. A continuous Mardi Gras will be inaugurated Monday evening with barrels of free confetti and brilliant illuminations. This evening a "mysterious Mr. Raffles" will invade the park and defy the merrymakers to capture him. Sunday the French Sisters, aerialists, will begin a limited engagement. The skirt and fire dances which they perform are extremely beautiful. In addition there will be the clever juggling and acrobatic work of the Ito-Kimura troupe of Japanese artists; Prince Albert, an educated horse; new feats by Frank Hall, the English lion tamer, with Wallace as his subject; the free theatre and an augmented concert band under the direction of George W. Bennett. For the children there will be a troupe of twenty monkeys, the flea circus, circus ponies, clowns and numerous riding devices.

Sutro's New Play

The latest play of Mr. Alfred Sutro, "Making a Gentleman," which has just been produced in the Garrick Theatre, London, seems to be of a disappointing character. After one good act it falls to pieces. A rich and vulgar old pickle merchant has reared his son and daughter in luxury and trained them in refinement. The son, after a course at Eton and Oxford, inhabits dainty chambers in London and leads a life of pleasure. The daughter has married the worthless son of a pauper peer. Then the pickle merchant, who has been speculating wildly, loses all his money and has to tell his children that all allowances must be stopped. The son behaves well, cheers the old man with sanguine visions of the future, and promises to start with him for Canada and there begin life anew. This is the first act, which is manifestly full of promise. Unfortunately there is no fulfillment, so far as any expectation of dramatic development is concerned. The weak son is easily persuaded by his aristocratic connections—and his selfish sister—that he would be a fool to exile himself, when a pretty widow, with a vast fortune, is ready to marry him at home. It is true that the character of the lady has been somewhat blown upon, but what of that? Such stains will be imperceptible beneath a covering of gilt. The boy yields to their arguments, and is in the end accepted by the widow.

Tully's New Play at Ye Liberty

For Portola week the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will offer "Cupid, the Cow-Punch," the new play by Richard Walton Tully, co-author of "The Rose of the Ranch." The piece is described by the author as an American play in four acts, founded upon Eleanor Gates' novel of the same name, but is not a "dramatization" in the narrow sense of the word, for that term has fallen into disrepute. "Cupid- the Cow-Punch" is being produced next week as a play, not as a series of representations from the book. But the many readers of the novel will find that the atmosphere and a majority of the striking incidents that made the book such a success are retained and presented in the play. Sydney Ayres will create the title role and Florence Oakley returns from her vacation to assume the leading feminine role. All the other favorites, and a number of new faces will be seen in the cast, and an unusually elaborate scenic production is being prepared.

The latest newspaper play is called "The Fourth Estate" and is the work of Joseph Medill Patterson of Chicago in collaboration with a Miss Harriett Ford. It tells the story of a fight between a millionaire proprietor and a federal judge who had once sent him to jail and is said to contain some very effective scenes.

The Ways of Royalty

By J. M. JACOBI

There are many things pertaining to royalty of which the general public has only the most vague idea. For example, it is generally believed that exalted court personages do not pay for their theatre boxes, and that everything is free to them in opera and drama. On the contrary, however, the royal box is paid for at the same rate as it would be by any ordinary playgoer.

King Edward is the most ardent playgoer, but he pays for his box always. He does not even send his equerry or secretary to engage the royal box, the matter being settled in a much more private manner. The principal of one of the Bond Street "libraries," as the West End theatre ticket offices are somewhat anomalously known in London, is periodically summoned to Marlborough House, and he takes with him a list of all the plays at the various theatres. The King goes through the list, and selects the theatre or theatres which he wishes to visit, and instructions are given to the "library" to engage the royal box for the nights named at the theatres selected.

Sometimes theatre managers in London find themselves in a very unpleasant position when they receive an intimation that the royal box is required for a night for which it has already been engaged by a private individual. Cases have occurred where it has been impossible to refuse the box to royal persons, and it has been necessary to let it twice over, and when the first purchaser has arrived he has been asked to accept another box in exchange. Sometimes he shows considerable vexation, but playgoers of the upper classes, who are usually the purchasers of the royal box, are generally intensely loyal, and very anxious to meet requirements of any member of the royal family.

Royalties are somewhat influenced in favor of particular theatres where the arrangements are peculiarly convenient in regard to the private entrance to the royal box, although the King is doubtless well aware that in some of the older theatres it is impossible to provide for the comfort of the royal family in going and coming as the manager would wish. At the Haymarket the royal entrance is in a small street at the back of the theatre, which, ending in a cul-de-sac, is almost as private as if it were a court yard belonging to the house. In former years this entrance and the passage connecting it with the royal box formed no part of the theatre itself, but belonged to a lodging house adjoining the theatre. For some time an annual rental was paid to the proprietor of the lodging house for the privilege of using this passage whenever royalty visited the theatre; and one of the conditions of the arrangement was that on such occasions none of the lodgers should be allowed to appear in the passage, or to open any doors in communication with it. When the theatre was enlarged the lodging house was purchased.

There are certain rules of etiquette which are observed in the great theatres when members of the royal family attend. When the box has been secured through one of the library ticket offices the manager of the office himself escorts the royal visitors from their carriage to the box, and the business manager of the theatre receives them at the door, as the representative of the management. In the theatres of modern construction there are handsomely furnished retiring rooms attached to the royal box, in which it is the custom to place cigarettes and coffee. When Queen Alexandra or a princess forms one of the party, a bouquet is usually put on a chair in the retiring room, her royal highness taking the flowers into the box with her. The programs placed in the royal box on these occasions are invariably printed on white satin.

His majesty objects to any demonstration in the theatre when he enters or leaves; consequently he does not wish the orchestra to play God Save the King, as is generally done on public occasions when his majesty enters. It is also worth mentioning that the King and all other members of the royal family are remarkably punctual in the time of arriving at the theatre.

There is always special etiquette for visitors who are on calling terms with the Queen, and any little breach of this etiquette is quickly noticed by her majesty, both she and the Princess of Wales being great sticklers for the letter of the law. If an ordinary visitor on intimate terms with the Queen wishes to be reached by Her Majesty, he or she must call at a time likely to find Her Majesty at leisure, and the visitor's name is taken to her in the ordinary way. After waiting a long time the visitor is conducted by a page to the Queen's room. Courtesies from ladies and deep bows from men are sometimes followed by the Queen's shaking hands, but she more frequently does so at the end of the visit.

At ordinary royal houses the guests assemble for dinner with their royal host and hostess, and they pair off in the usual way according to the rule of precedence. At the home of the Fifes it is not so; the guests assemble in the library, and when all are there, including the duke, the servant announces "The princess." All rise and bow or courtesy. Then a second announcement comes "The princess is served," and she walks out first and alone, the duke following with the lady whose right it is—seemingly a most uncomfortable and unsociable fashion.

Queen Alexandra does not visit shops in person, as do many of the princesses. She has her commands written and sent to the various establishments she patronizes, and the proprietors of these despatch special messengers with the goods she desires to see. These messengers, as a rule wait while she inspects the articles, but sometimes goods are left for a time to await inspection by Her Majesty. The couriers of various royal personages, from Her Majesty downward, are to be seen daily in the West End of London, executing commissions and giving orders for goods to be submitted on approval for their royal employers. As a rule, it is the custom to despatch the article required by some trustworthy member of the firm. He visits the royal residence and sees a footman, to whom he explains his errand, and then is passed on for examination by several other footmen, until at length by a series of stages he is brought into the presence of a lady-in-waiting, who takes his message as to prices and other details of the goods ordered, and also takes the goods themselves to be examined by the attending royal purchaser. Her Majesty is somewhat fastidious as to orders she gives for personal requisites. It is a well-known fact that should they show these articles, or allow any description of them to appear in the press, Her Majesty would at once deprive them of her custom.

The Queen is said to be the most fastidious of all royalties as regards her dress. Whatever is made for her in the way of dresses must never look as though needles and cotton have been employed in the building of them. Bodices must fit like a glove and there must be no unpicking of seams or alteration that will show the mark of a needle or stitch. She understands dressmaking thoroughly, for did not she and her sister make their own frocks in their early days in quiet little Denmark?

King Edward is by no means the dumpy little man that most of his pictures indicate. It is not every man turned 60, with a forty-five inch chest, who can boast of a waist of no more than forty inches. If he occasionally appears stouter, it is because he likes his clothes to be loose and easy. This is especially the case with those particular suits known as "dittoes." For these he never under any circumstances pays more than $40. A few years ago Sir Francis Knollys, his private secretary, finding that his tailor was overcharging him, fixed upon eight guineas as the uniform price of each suit. They are ordered in half-dozens at a time. There is likewise a regular and fixed price of $12 for his trousers, which under no pretext whatsoever, save in the case of uniforms, is exceeded.

The King has a horror of evening dress, which he considers hideous. He prefers the style to a uniform, however, and uses twelve suits a year, at a fixed price of $80 a suit. Let me add that His Majesty never wears any pair of trousers more than four times, and, as the discarded clothes of royalty are not allowed to be appropriated by the valets but are all preserved there is a stock of thousands of them at Marlborough House.

This need surprise no one, for when King George IV died his clothes were sold at public auction, the sale lasting over three weeks, and there were no fewer than 500 fur-lined coats alone. All the King's clothes, old and new, are kept at Marlborough House in what are known as the brushing rooms," several men being employed to look after them. All his hats, especially the old ones, are for some reason or other kept at Sandringham. He abominates the high silk hat, his favorite headgear being that which is known in this country as the "derby" and in England as the "bowler." The high hats which he wears are by preference a bell in shape and with a rather wide rolling brim.

The Italians of San Francisco and Their Important Business

By Professor R. Georgio

On the slopes of two hills with a marine view that makes the quarter the most picturesque in the city, in the rolling valley between them, and along the north beach of the beautiful bay, the new Italian quarter is showing remarkable activity and progress. The central location of the Italian quarter remains as it was before the fire, but in the Mission, in the Potrero and in South San Francisco, other Italian communities have been formed and are gradually extending.

The Italians of San Francisco are the same people as the Italians of the old country. Their essential characteristics have continuously revealed them as a great body of respectable, hardworking, thriving people, very devoted to their homes. To them, certainly, we are indebted for the labor which has helped build our beloved city and develop the agricultural resources of California. Wine, fruits, vegetables, fish, salt, marble, manufactured pastes are handled almost exclusively by Italians. We count a great many professional men, artists and contractors among the local Italians who maintain also an Italian Chamber of Commerce with over one hundred members. They have monopolized the scavenger business with their good plant of the "Sanitary Reduction Works."

The Italian restaurants are well known and liberally patronized by all classes all over the city. Where is that San Franciscan that has not enjoyed the delicious "ravioli' or the "risotto a la milanese"? As to cooking, Italians have certainly led the way, but they are taking in, fast enough, the ambitions, the ideals, the principles and business ways of our imperishable Americanism.

Look at the magnificent building of the Bank of Italy; think for a moment of the new big Anglo-California Wine Company, organized with $500,000.00 of capital and you will easily find out that a new element is coming up among our Italians. It is the young element which is coming to the front, not with the hesitation and slowness of the pioneers, but in a daring and true American business way, although the old and bourbon element is always trying to retain the position and influence acquired. The tricks, continuous self-ostentation and stupid egotism of a few cannot arrest the progress of this young element which with courage, perseverance and labor is gradually getting the upperhand.

While we can do without wine, a prohibitionist may say, we cannot absolutely do without fruits and vegetables. So it will be well to note some interesting facts regarding the important industry of raising and marketing vegetables.

Italians furnish the city of San Francisco with 95 per cent of the vegetables consumed and one of the best institutions that has ever been established on the Pacific Coast by these foreign-born people is certainly the Colombo Market of San Francisco. Vegetables are one of the first and most essential requirements of life in any community, and Italians have provided the city of San Francisco, since the year 1874, with a general and well regulated public vegetable market.

In all the United States the two well regulated vegetable markets in the hands of foreigners are one in New Orleans in the hands of Frenchmen, and the other in San Francisco in the hands of Italians. The Colombo Market is a building 275x120 feet with frontage on Davis and Front, Pacific and Clark streets, with a big passage way running through from one end to the other. It is divided into eighty-eight stalls, with stores on the four corners. This market is controlled by two Italian corporations, "The San Francisco Gardeners' and Ranchers' Association" and "The Gardeners' and Ranchers' Protective Association for the Counties of San Francisco and San Mateo."

The system that they generally use in establishing themselves in business is that of renting a certain number of acres of land where water can be readily pumped by windmills, or can be easily obtained from some small creek, running through their land. They really transform the sandy land around San Francisco into very good and rich soil. By free use of water and fertilizers they make it produce to its full capacity the year round. This system is certainly admirable. They usually form co-operative companies numbering from two to eleven partners, all working hard from morning until night. They are content to work because they have good returns for their labor. They are a saving people and the very first thing they do is to build temporary comfortable quarters where needed, on leased land; then they begin buying land little by little until they often become owners of the rented lands. Even when they are owners of the land they are generally associated with others in cultivating it. They have found out that it is the only way to be successful, when all are working together and for the same results.

The leading Italian restaurants are also based on the same co-operative plan and it is hoped that Italians will carry their successful system of co-operation into other fields and into other activities.

The Italians and Rehabilitation

By Ettore Patrizi

When the history of the wonderful resurrection of San Francisco after the great catastrophe of 1906 is written, several pages should be devoted to the help that the Italian residents of our city lent to their American brethren in reviving this most interesting city in the world, and undoubtedly the dearest, the most sympathetic and attractive of all cities in the United States. Before the dreadful line of flames that swept the vital part of the city finally died away, some Italians came back from across the bay where they had found refuge during the march of the fire, brought what lumber they could find in the vicinity and started to rebuild their homes. It was like a signal which gave courage and pluck to others and within eight months after the awful disaster, on the beautiful picturesque hills of North Beach, the Italian quarter was practically rebuilt and the energetic, thrifty and good-hearted sons of Italy celebrated Christmas with their children on the very spots where they last celebrated it before the fire.

The Italians love their homes and families above anything else in the world; and this is why their first thought, their first efforts, their first money secured, were devoted to the rebuilding of their homes.

After this was accomplished, after their hearts were at rest as to the problem of securing comfortable dwellings for their beloved ones, then their energies were turned to the resurrection of their various trades and professions. With great rapidity the Italian business district, down in Sansome, Battery, Front and Davis streets was re-established together with hundreds of smaller stores on Montgomery avenue, Dupont and Stockton streets, and Broadway with its characteristic restaurants. Their ware-houses were again refilled with imported edibles from Italy; their wineries were again supplied with generous wines made out of the grapes which other countrymen of theirs grow in California; the fish market and vegetable market became again active and busy, and new and larger enterprises were started, which soon made them and the whole city forget that a disaster had only a few months before destroyed the Italian quarter. Nor can it be ignored that it was due to the Italian quarter, through an able Italian architect, L. Mastropasqua, that the first reinforced concrete building was erected in our city.

ETTORE PATRIZI

President of the Bank of Italy.

As figures are much more eloquent than words, it is proper to remember that in April, 1907, on the first anniversary of the great disaster, the Italians had already built over seven hundred buildings, had started over six hundred stores and had invested nearly $6,000,000 in their new buildings and no less than $4,000,000 in their new stores and warehouses. Moreover, in addition to the three great and prosperous banks the Italian Colony had before the fire, a new one was started a few months afterwards, the assets of these four Italian banking institutions having reached the amount of nearly $11,000,000, without counting the several million deposits which the Italian keep in the various American banks of our city.

Thus the Italians have helped and continue to help the resurrection of this great metropolis which they love as their own native land, and of which they are as proud as the most enthusiastic American born.

Bank of Italy

The history of the Bank of Italy is unique and illuminating. Started in auspicious circumstances during the latter months of 1904 this institution has in five short years attained to a solid position of which its patrons and its officers are equally proud. The beginning of the year 1906 found it firmly established in financial security and its reputation strongly fixed in the minds of the Italian residents of this city. Its growth was exceedingly rapid but none the less conservative and its strength and dependability were evidenced to all by the sane conduct of its business. Only legitimate banking activities have been countenanced; from its inception speculation and chance have been persistently excluded. Conservatism has always been its watchword and one of its guiding principles has been gracious and uniform courtesy to all depositors irrespective of the size of their accounts.

Just when the Bank of Italy was in the full enjoyment of its deserved prosperity and gathering the fruit of its hard-won success, the earthquake and fire came to try the souls of bankers as of all other San Franciscans. But the officers of the Bank of Italy had no time for lamentation; they proceeded straightway to pluck good out of misfortune. The youthful institution made stirring history in those dark days. Undaunted by adversity it was the first financial institution to open its doors and although it was the infant among banks, it assumed the grave responsibilities of older and more mature foundations, conducting its affairs with surprising sureness and sagacity. Led by its manager A. P. Giannini its officers preached the gospel of rehabilitation and announced that the Bank of Italy would assist with all its means in the big task. The first portion of this city to rebuild permanetly was the North End district and the first load of lumber hauled to this section was paid for out of the money available from the Bank of Italy. Ever since then the bank has been an important factor in the continuance of the work of rehabilitation.

Success followed success in the Bank of Italy and the volume of its business increased so rapidly that it was forced to look for more commodious quarters. The result is that the bank today is housed in one of the most beautiful buildings in the west. Its equipment is of the latest fire proof pattern and the architectural splendor of the structure is an attraction not lost on those with artistic appreciation.

When the financial crisis of 1907 held the whole country in its grasp, the Bank of Italy was prepared for the emergency. While most of the banks were paying only in clearing house certificates, the Bank of Italy was accommodating its customers with gold. It emerged from that difficulty as it had from the other, stronger and better because the proper custody of its clients' interests was its prime consideration.

INTERIOR VIEW OF THE BANK OF ITALY

The story of the growth of the Bank of Italy as told by figures is an inspiring one. The assets at the end of December, 1904, amounted to $285,436.97; at the end of the following year they had reached $1,021,290.80; at the end of December, 1906, they were $1,899,947.28; at the end of 1907 the assets had jumped to $2,221,347.35; in December, 1908, they had risen to $2,574,004.90; and at the end of June of this year the figures were $3,037,955.09.

A great work limits us for the moment, because we feel it above our powers; and only in so far as we afterwards incorporate it with out culture, and make it part of our mind and heart, does it become a dear and worthy object in our life and thought.

Calegaris Prescription Pharmacy

The Calegaris Prescription Pharmacy was established in the year 1878 by Cav. Uff. Joseph Calegaris. It was immediately re-established on its old site after the fire of 1906 and for two years was conducted in a portable house on the sidewalk, entirely surrounded by ruins. Before the completion of the permanent building Cav. Uff. Calegaris sold the business to his son Arnold and retired to his beautiful villa in Italy. Arnold Calegaris proved equal to the task and fitted up one of the most beautiful and complete prescription pharmacies in this city. No expense was spared to make the store which is all in white and gold as attractive as possible. Arnold Calegaris has proved himself a very energetic young business man and is a leader in the Italian colony. He is a director of the Italian Chamber of Commerce and at the head of many organizations. He is also the largest stockholder in the Anglo-California Wine Company, a new corporation formed about six months ago by the younger Italians with large vineyards at Healdsburg. He is also a member of many clubs and societies. It is through his efforts, assisted by James Fugazi and Louis Guinasso, that the Italian quarter is being decorated for the Portola Festival.

Portola, an Artificial Hero

him the questionable fame with which his memory is now being clothed as with a ready-made garment, for in the search for Monterey Bay his expedition advanced within sight of San Francisco Bay.

The perplexity of the good don as he turned his back on the bay for which he was looking and pushed northward is really laughable, although Mr. Eldredge is too serious a historian to dwell upon the lighter side of his predicament. When it is remembered that Portola was looking for a port which could be fortified for the protection of the coast against the Russians and be used as a port of call for vessels from the Philippines, his subsequent activities seem absolutely stupid. When the expedition reached the summit of what is now Point San Pedro they gazed down from that bold promontory upon a sight which, in the language of Mr. Eldredge, "quickened their flagging spirits. Before them, bright and beautiful, was spread a great ensenada, its waters dancing in the sunlight. Far to the northwest a point reached out into the sea, rising abruptly before them, high above the ocean. Further to the left, west-north-west, were seen six or seven white Farallones and finally along the shore northward they discerned the white cliffs and what appeared to be the mouth of an inlet." This of course was the stretch of water reaching from Point San Pedro to Point Reyes at that time known as the bay or port of San Francisco and later called the Gulf of the Farallones. A scouting party brought word to Portola that they had found immense estuaries which ran far back into the land and that friendly Indians had informed them that they were only two days' journey from a port in which a ship was anchored. The poor man wondered whether he had not at last found the bay of Monterey, little troubling his head about latitudinal difficulties; but after blundering about the lower end of what is now the city of San Francisco, he decided that the waters discovered were really part of what had been charted as the port or bay of San Francisco and determined to turn to the south again in search of his darling bay of Monterey. If Portola had not been so obsessed with the importance of discovering the bay of Monterey that the immense inland waters about which he had been aimless wandering failed to impress their possibilities upon his slow mind, he would have been a real discoverer and it would never have been necessary to exhume his deeds from the closed caverns of history. Even Mr. Eldredge, I think, would have found him a more sympathetic subject if he had persisted in investigating the strangely alluring tales of the friendly Indians. Unfortunately however the late Senator Ingalls had not yet written his justly admired sonnet and Portola, unwarned, let slip the opportunity to become a great man. For these palpable errors of judgment Mr. Eldredge has no criticism. When he is forced to tell, as a conscientious historian, how Portola on again passing Monterey Bay, set up a cross and buried beneath it a bottle recording the fact that they had NOT found Monterey Bay, he does not indulge either in commiseration or hilarity. Only when he has brought Portola back from San Diego on a second expedition does he seem to give way to a certain exultation as he tells how his hero, taking a third and last look at the bay he had so persistently snubbed, decided that it must after all be that for which he was searching. This then is the hero whom we are asked to honor as the discoverer of the bay of San Francisco. If his stupid wanderings up and down our coast argue him made of the stuff heroic may I be condemned to bread and water in solitary confinement while Queen Vergilia and Don Nicolas de Covarrubias are whipping the giddy top of revelry along our bedizened streets.

As to the book which Mr. Eldredge has made, I shall not speak censoriously for its literary character. I must confess to a partiality for the free play of fancy over the surface of historical narrative and in this Mr. Eldredge has not seen fit to indulge me or any of his readers. I think he might have done so with advantage to the subject and with no hurt to history. Our greatest historians have not discounted their authority by decking their pages with the beauties of style and the jewels of observation and reflection. Too bad that Mr. Eldredge has not followed their example in a work destined to find a place on many shelves as the authoritative narrative of the incidents on which our fiesta was based. There are minor lapses which I have pencilled but shall not dwell upon. Radient should be radiant on page 16, line 1; to memorandums on page 19, line 12, a nice latinity prefers memoranda; and to say, "to stampede them, it is enough for them to discover a coyote or fox,, is to show less than deference for grammatical construction. Let us remember however that Homer nodded and be charitable. Yet must I protest at the identification of a tortilla with a pancake; Connecticut and California have as little in common. Likewise I cannot allow Mr. Eldredge to describe an indulgence as a plenary remission of sins in this world and the next. Before Mr. Eldredge undertook to explain the indulgence of Porciuncula he should have read far enough into some Catholic catechism to master the correct definition of this disciplinary measure which has before now set the world by the ears.

Clellan and told how a Brooklyn boy named George B. Duffy had been arrested, photographed by the police, and branded as a felon, by having his name entered in the index of bad characters. This happened on June 17, 1907. Duffy was discharged by a magistrate, as no complaint had been made against him. After that Duffy was, according to Gaynor, "arrested again and again on sight and without warrant or cause, except that he was in the rogues' gallery, and therefore to be hunted." Gaynor repeated his old charges against "police lawlessness," and said that General Bingham, police commissioner, was "possessed of the most dangerous and destructive delusions that officials can entertain in a free government, namely, that he is under no legal restraint whatever, but may do as he wills, instead of only what the law permits, and that only in the manner it prescribes." Bingham was ousted by the Mayor, and Gaynor uttered himself for publication in characteristic style:

"I say unto you that what has happened this day is only the beginning of the restoration of free government to the people of New York and the teaching of its police rulers that they are not above the law. You cannot rule a free people in a lawless way.

Many people thought the Duffy incident a cleverly arranged Tammany "plant." It was charged that Gaynor had come to the rescue of Duffy and "free government" because he was ambitious to be Mayor and wanted to get into the limelight. He repudiated the charge. "I say to you," he told one man, "that this matter has nothing to do with politics. I have, as everybody must know, been offered the nomination for Mayor twice, and twice I have declined it. If I ever run for Mayor it will be because the good people of the community make a demand for it, and I believe you know that I have not the vanity to think that this will ever happen." Gaynor was right on this last point. There has been no clamorous demand by the "good people" for his nomination. The Fusion forces declined to consider him after he had made it plain that he would not refuse a Tammany nomination; the Tammany district leaders did not want him because they feared they would be unable to hold the Catholic vote; McCarren, though a friend of Gaynor, was not altogether pleased at losing prestige by having the nomination for comptroller get away from Brooklyn, in view of Gaynor being the representative of that borough on the ticket.

With the Oakland Portola road race close at hand interest in the big road contest is general throughout the State. According to reports received by M. J. Laymance, chairman of the finance committee, there will be close to 200,000 people at the race. These spectators are coming from all sections of the coast. Ample accommodations are being made for the big crowd. The grandstand committee will have one of the largest structures of this kind ever erected for an automobile contest. The stand will seat at least 10,000 people. From this stand, which will be at the starting and finish line, one of the best views of the race can be had. A view of at least five miles is possible from the official stand. As a further convenience to the spectators, the committee has made arrangements to keep track of every car in the race, from the time it leaves at the start until it crosses the finish line. This will be done by electric lights and telephone service. Each machine will be represented on the score board by an electric light and this will be used to show the exact location of the car around the course. This is probably the first attempt to trace racing cars by electric and telephone service ever made. A great many telephones will be used, stations being erected at frequent intervals around the course. Operators at these stations will telephone the official stand immediately after each machine passes the respective stations. With very little work the Oakland course has been put in fine condition. The course starts at the Frick School, about two miles south of High street, Fruitvale. The races will start north, going on to the Foothill Boulevard, to Deering avenue, turning down Deering avenue for a distance of about two blocks, then turning south on the San Leandro road. From Deering on to Haywards is where the fastest time of the race will be made. This is over a ten mile straightaway with a slight down grade, and offers one of the best opportunities for record breaking driving in the country. It is the opinion of the best known drivers in this State that this stretch of road beats any course in the world and it is on this piece of Alameda County thoroughfare that the drivers depend to make their record breaking time. From Deering on to Haywards the course lies through Elmhurst and San Leandro. Turing east at Haywards, the races will go a distance of about two blocks and again reach the Foothill Boulevard, over which the return journey will be made. On this half of the course the mettle and skill of the drivers will be tested. There are several turns in the homestretch that rival the famous hairpin turn in the Vanderbilt course, and it is along this part of the course that the greatest crowds are expected. The element of danger will draw the majority of excitement seeking spectators. Even with the curves, however, the Boulevard course is so wide and smooth that the drivers expect no trouble in keeping to their record breaking speed which they can maintain on the first half of the course. With every preparation as to seeing the race and the conditions of the course speaking for the success of the race, the famous drivers who have been on the course for the last ten days are straining every nerve to get their machines in shape and otherwise become familiar with the condition of the course for the morning of October 23. Probably the greatest number of high class cars and drivers will face the starter than ever started in an event of this sort. The Stearns with Charles Saules, Lozier with Harry Michiner, Knox with Frank Free, Lexington with Gordon Murray, Alco with Earl Cooper, Chalmers-Detroit with Howard Worner, Frank Murray with a Buick and Cliff Ontank with a Stevens-Duryea are among the best know drivers who will try for the honors of the race.

The basement of the Emporium building where San Francisco's greatest automobile show will be in progress commencing today has been turned into a flower garden. Yellow chrysanthemums and poinsettas predominate in the decorating effect in honor of the Portola celebration. The king and queen of the festival will be in attendance on the opening night, and M. H. De Young, as president of the automobile club of California, will deliver the opening address. While society, as is its custom, will take advantage of the automobile show to don its purple and fine linen every night of the exhibition, one night has been set aside by the program committee as "Society Night." Thursday, October 21, has been agreed upon as the best for this purpose.

Thomas B. Jeffery & Company, one of the first to build automobiles in this country whose factory has grown to such proportions that at the present time it is undoubtedly the largest factory in the world, have announced their new Rambler product for 1910. This announcement is of special interest because the word had been passed that in future Thomas B. Jeffery & Company would devote their entire attention to the production of four cylinder cars, and a reduction of prices was anticipated. There are three Rambler touring cars—Model Fity-five, seven passenger, $2650; Model Fifty-four, five passenger, $2400, and Model Fifty-three, five passenger touring car practically a duplicate of the car which was sold last year at $2550, which is now listed at $2000. These prices include five lamps, tools, horn, pump, jack and magneto. All these models have full 36x4 inch tires or larger, according to the size of the car, and the horsepower is ample to meet the requirements of the steepest grades and deepest sand. With the exception of springs, tires and electrical equipment all of the component parts of Rambler cars are built in their own factory. All parts are interchangeable, and the Rambler factory points with pride to their record of last season, which is, that during the entire season not an order for a duplicate part was held up at the factory to exceed twenty-four hours. The four cylinder models of 1908 and 1909 have created a tremendous demand for these cars,

"A Boon to the Convalescent"

Following a severe illness the patient's vitality reaches the lowest ebb during convalescence. A little assistance at that time enables the system to build up the wasted tissues and prevent a dangerous relapse.

Eminent physicians agree that there is no tonic more beneficial than a pure Port Wine, and we can cheerfully recommend Cluff & Herry's "Invalid Port" made and bottled in Oporto.

Per Bottle, $1.50. Per Case, $16.50.

and it is noteworthy to state that seventy-five per cent of the output of the factory for 1910 has been contracted for by agents throughout the United States, and it is reasonable to presume that by January 1 the output of the factory will be sold. Intending purchasers will do well to examine this car personally at the Automobile Show, where will also be exhibited besides the models named above, a limousine, which is said to be a masterpiece of automobile construction. This will be sold on this coast for $3900.

One of the most interesting European trips ever made in an automobile is that made in Charles Page's 1908 Packard car by a party consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Page, Mrs. Hickey, Stanley H. Page, Charles J. Belden and Eugene Phelps. This Packard was purchased in this city. The party left New York on March 27, landed at Naples and toured the surrounding country. From Naples they went to Rome, from Rome to Florence, Bologna, Venice, Milan, over the maritime Alps to Nice, Paris, Tours, the chateaux district, Geneva, Heidelberg, Frankfurt and Hamburg. FromHamburg the party went back to Lucern, over the St. Gothard in a heavy blizzard to the Italian lakes; then back over the Simplon pass to Montreux, over the Bernese Oberland and Brunig pass through Lucern to Zurich. A continuation of the tour took them from Munich to Berlin, Konigsberg, over the Russian frontier at Virballen to St. Petersburg. From St. Petersburg they went to Moscow, Warsaw, Breslau and then to Berlin again. The party will go from Berlin through Belgium and France and then to England and Scotland. To date they have covered 8,000 miles. They found the roads in Italy good, in France excellent, in Switzerland medium, in Germany mostly good, in Russia very rough. Here they found great difficulty in getting gasoline and accommodations.

"With the various automobile factories of the east working a full force of men the full year round it will be impossible to produce an oversupply against the spring demand for cars," says Hayden Eames, general manager of the Studebaker automobile company, who, in company with E. Le Roy Pelletier, advertising manager for the same company, is making a tour of the country visiting the company's various branches. "At this rate more than 200,000 cars will be manufactured during this period, but, even at that, the demand will by far exceed the supply. With quantity production as perfect as it is now, which is especially true with the Studebakers, one can get a car of greater value than has ever before been the case. This fact has accelerated the demand again and with every small drop in the price of cars the range of possibilities is increased. This explains why for the first time in the history of the industry the manufacturer has found it practical to keep a full force working the year round. In the early days the automobile was looked upon as purely a fad and pleasure vehicle, absolutely unfitted for winter use. Now we find that in those States where there are heavy snowfalls as well as in the States which have a rainy season the comforts of the automobile are even greater than those of the car during the pleasant touring season of the summer. Not ten per cent of the owners now lay up their cars during the winter season. All of which is due to the great improvements that have been made on the cars of earlier dates." E. Le Roy Pelletier, who is recognized by the men who are leaders in the industry as one of the best posted automobile men in the country, reiterates Eames' views and adds that he has the utmost confidence in the future and permanency of the industry. "The Studebaker concern alone," says Pelletier, "during the next year will manufacture 46,400 cars, representing $39,000,000 in volume. This includes the big Studebaker '40-s,' the Studebaker F-M-F '30-s,' the Studebaker-Flanders '20-s,' the Studebaker electric pleasure vehicles and commercial trucks. There is a bigger future for the commercial truck at the present time than there ever has been in the past; the prospects for it are even better than for the electric pleasure vehicle. The progress of the commercial truck has been retarded by unintelligent application of it and to eliminate this feature the Studebaker concern maintains a force of expert engineers, whose sole duties are to study the conditions of the concerns contemplating their use. By doing this, the Studebaker concern hopes to and eventually will eliminate the desire on the part of some makers to simply sell their stuff." Both Pelletier and Eames went from this city to Portland and Seattle, where they will visit the Studebaker branches. On leaving these cities they will return direct to the factory at South Bend, Ind.

The little Hudson has already made a record of which it may justly be proud. Driven by M. E. Pinkhard, during the rain storm of last week when only one other car, and that a touring car of great power, attempted the trip over the mountains, the little machine made the treacherous stretch of grade up the Russian River Canyon without the slightest difficulty and went over the Pieta Road to the Summit, much of the distance on the high. It arrived at Lakeport with a time record but slightly inferior to that made by the big cars during pleasant weather. The return was by way of Ukiah over roads that were very bad, in places almost impassable, by reason of water from two to three feet deep. Mr. Pinkhard states that on the way back he made the run from Lakeport to Cloverdale in three hours, which considering the condition of the roads is very good running time. He had absolutely no trouble and did not even lift the hood except for oil.

Dr. T. C. Tredwell, for many years a practicing physician of New York City, is in San Francisco, having made the trip from the metropolis across the continent in his Buick "40" touring car. The doctor has long been a horse fancier and maintained a stable of four thoroughbreds until he was seized with the automobile mania. The result was that the doctor was soon en route to the Pacific Coast in his Buick "40" touring car. Leaving New York on June 14 and accompanied by Mrs. Tredwell and her brother, Dr. Tredwell steered up the west side of the Hudson and toward the Catskill mountains. Erie, Pa., was the next objective point, after which short stops were made at Ashtabula, Cleveland and Toledo, Ohio. Three weeks were spent in Chicago, St. Louis furnished amusement for the tourists for a period of one month and at Denver a stop of three weeks was also made. The route was taken through Cheyenne and Laramie and followed as closely as possible the Union Pacific Railroad as far as Green River, where the course was laid for Portland, Oregon. The party has just reached San Francisco from the northern city. A complete camping outfit was carried on the machine and many nights their tent was pitched in true old overland tourist fashion by the roadside. The physician has been his own chauffeur and mechanician on the entire trip and is very loud in his praise of the perfect manner in which his machine has come through the many trying ordeals to which it has been subjected on the long journey. The doctor says there were no roads at all in the State of Wyoming, and, upon reaching the salesrooms of the Howard Automobile Company, after a brief description of the great obstacles which were encountered, and asked what work he desired done on his machine before proceeding on his journey he replied: "There is not one thing necessary to be done to my machine; it is running more perfectly today that when I left New York and I shall proceed to Los Angeles in a few days."

Hayden Eames and E. Le Roy Pelletier, together with fifty representatives of the Studebaker Bros. in California, were the guests of Chester N. Weaver, vice-president and general manager of the local Studebaker Bros.' branch at a banquet which was held last Saturday at the Cliff House.

Jack London's Latest

The story of "Martin Eden" may be summed up in one sentence from Charles Reade: "The fortunate man is he who, being poor or nobody, works gradually up to wealth and consideration, and, having got them, dies before he finds out they were not worth so much trouble." Martin Eden did not die, though he made the discovery of their worthlessness. His magnificent body outlasted the zest of life, and the tired brain left without a stimulus, its work completed, he quietly slipped away rather than linger idle about the scenes of his strenuous labors. No one who has followed the career of Jack London during the ten years since his name first appeared in a magazine index and has noted even casually the various biographical details which have been published from time to time can regard "Martin Eden" as a novel, and it is no easy task to pass comment and stricture on characters easily identified. The editors and managers of some prominent publications will have an opportunity to experience the sensations of beetles impaled on pins. "Cultured society" fares no better at his hands. The story is that of a young sailor, an ex-tough and gang leader, introduced for the first time, into a home of ordinary comfort and refinement. Not yet twenty-one, he has lived and seen more of life than any of the Morse family has for generations, but to Eden, with his groping after better things, the books, the pictures, the comfortable furniture and food are all novelties and proportionately wonderful, which is natural enough from his basis of comparison. More wonderful than all the rest is Ruth, the daughter of the household, three or four years his senior, whom he immediately exalts to a pedestal and worships as a goddess. And Ruth, probably for the first time in her sheltered existence, coming into contact with a MAN, is no less impressed, but her colder, "educated" taste and temperament, is slower to respond. She does not mean to fall in love, but in spite of herself she does, much to the chagrin of her relatives who, however, are wise enough to make no active interference. Aroused by the radiant vision, and stimulated by even so small a contact with higher intellectual life, Eden takes himself in hand and determines to educate himself, Ruth Morse acting as governess, correcting his grammar, slovenly speech and slang, which, picturesque and expressive as it is, drawn from the life that Eden has known, jars on her sensitive nerves. She is a student at the University of California, and familiar enough with college slang, but that, of course, is another matter. Eden, though he gladly sits at her feet at first soon outgrows his mentor, but to the end she continues to measure his ocean in her own little tin cup and to try to persuade him that the fault lies in his abundance, not in her restricted view of it. The boy, for he is no more than that, becomes possessed of an idea that it is in him to write. He has seen and experienced. He has read and studied, and he is confident that he has more to tell and can tell it better than nine-tenths of the authors who scratch out a living with their pens. But he has no one to advise or direct him. His only information is derived from chance newspaper paragraphs, but he has a sublime confidence in himself a splendid egotism which tells him to persevere. Of course his few relatives urge him to "get a job," while Ruth, with her book-learned reverence for "literature," gives him every discouragement she can and longs to have him "obtain a position," that they may marry and she may lead her tame bear in silken chains and have him perform tricks at her bidding for the entertainment of her friends. But the trouble with Eden is that after a certain point has been reached the bear refuses to be further tamed and he will not lead gracefully. In a very little while he is far better educated than any of his new associates, though their conventional minds can never grasp that fact nor comprehend that all knowledge had to be acquired in some other way before it found its way into books at all. While to them he is virtually illiterate, having no college diploma to vouch for him, he is all the while wondering what they have done with their education. Ruth Morse, with her narrow, cut and dried moralities, is not one to break away from the accepted rules of her class. While Eden toils and starves, cutting down his night's allowance of sleep and his daily amount of food to the lowest notch consistent with mere physical existence, she holds up to him as examples the financially successful ones of her circle and, seeing only the immediate end, the payment for work, urges her lover to give it up. Mr. London has had what is rare courage for these days, and instead of giving us a conventionally "happy ending' in a marriage which would have eventually landed Eden in a lunatic asylum or a divorce court, lets the lady break her engagement and scorn her unpliant suitor. But when success comes, success beyond his wildest expectations, when, having done good work which he knows is good, and had his satisfaction in the doing—when fame and fortune are both his, she and her society are ready and anxious to take him back into grace—but he no longer cares. It is a phase of life that he has finished with forever. He cannot return any more than he can go back to the class from which he originated or the rough laborers with whom he once worked and lived gladly. His zest for his work is exhausted and there is no new stimulus, for no one has cared for the man or his work—only for the visible, tangible reward of it. The worst feature of the whole recital is its ghastly truth. There is not one amongst us that is not compelled to answer himself truthfully that if Martin Eden came knocking at our doors today, uncouth in speech and dress, scarred by the early contact with the world's rough hand, we would look past the brains, see only the brawn, and bid him begone about his business lest we hand him over to the police. Despite the hardships which fill its pages and the tragic end, "Martin Eden" is not a gloomy recital, for its hero was no pitiful whiner. He met life as it came to him and lived each phase to the full. Whether he was proving his mastery by the use of his fists, serving a hard term in forecastle or a still harder one in the laundry over "fancy starch," or starving in his little room in the Portuguese hovel while he labored over his self imposed task of writing, there was always "A brave sky and a glad wind rushing by;

A clear trail and an hour for meditation,
A long day and the joy to make it fly;
A hard task and the music to achieve it,
A fierce moon and a well-contented gloam;
A good strife, and no great regret to leave it;
A still night, and the far red lights of home."

In the Matter of the Estate of TOMASSO DEMATTEI, (also known as TOMOSO DEMOTTEI), Deceased.

It appearing to the satisfaction of the Court from the verified petition of CAROLINA DEMATTEI, administratrix of the Estate of TOMASSO DEMATTEI, also known as TOMOSO DEMOTTEI, deceased, on file herein, that it is necessary to sell a part of the estate of said deceased in order to pay the debts, expenses and charges of administration of the estate of said deceased, which have already accrued, and which will or may accrue hereafter during the administration of said estate and that it will be to the best interest, advantage and benefit of said estate and of all the persons interested therein.

It is ordered by the Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said TOMASSO DEMATTEI, also known as TOMOSO DEMOTTEI, deceased, appear before the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, at the Courtroom of Department No. 10 thereof in the Grant Building, situated on the Southeast corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in said County and State, on the 3rd day of November, 1909, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why an order, as prayed for in the petition, should not be granted to the said administratrix to sell all that part of the real estate of said deceased, at either public or private sale, for the purposes mentioned in the petition, as he shall judge to be for the best interests of said estate and of the parties interested therein which said part of said parcel of real property is described as follows:

All that certain piece or parcel of land situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and more particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the Southwesterly line of Holyoke Street distant thereon Two Hundred (200) feet Northwesterly from the Northwesterly line of Silliman Street; running thence Northwesterly and along said Southwesterly line of Holyoke Street Twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Southwesterly One Hundred Twenty (120) feet; thence at right angles Southeasterly Twenty-five (25) feet and thence at right angles Northeasterly One Hundred and Twenty (120) feet to the Southwesterly line of Holyoke Street and the point of commencement.

Being part of Lot No. 1 in Block No. 37, University Homestead Association.

It is further ordered, that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four (4) successive weeks, in "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in said county.

Dated, this 27th day of September, 1909.

THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 18,665.

WILLIAM C. ESPY, sometimes known as W. C. ESPY, and MARY CATHERINE ESPY, his wife, Plaintiffs,

vs.

All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California, to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of WILLIAM C. ESPY, sometimes known as W. C. ESPY, and MARY CATHERINE ESPY, his wife, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and county, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, bounded and more particularly described as follows:

Parcel No. 1. Commencing at a point on the Northerly line of "A" Street, distant thereon eighty-two (82) feet six (6) inches Westerly from the Westerly line of Tenth Avenue; running thence Westerly along the said Northerly line of "A" Street twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Northerly one hundred (100) feet, thence at right angles Easterly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles Southerly one hundred (100) feet to the Northerly line of "A" Street and the point of commencement. Being a portion of Outside Lands Block number Two Hundred and Seventy-four (274).

Parcel No. 2. Commencing at a point on the Easterly line of Third Avenue, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet Southerly from the Southerly line of Clement Street; running thence Southerly along said Easterly line of Third Avenue twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Easterly one hundred and twenty (120) feet; thence at right angles Northerly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles Westerly one hundred and twenty (120) feet to the Easterly line of Third Avenue and the point of commencement. Being a portion of Outside Lands Block number One Hundred and Eighty-three (183).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That the above entitled Court make and enter its decree:

1st.—Ascertaining and determining all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description.

2nd.—Establishing and determining the title of plaintiff to said property and that plaintiff be adjudged and decreed to be the owner in fee simple absolute of all of said property.

3rd.—For such other and further relief as to the Court may seem just.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 25th day of September, 1909.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 24,299, Dept. 12.

ELLA REEVES, Plaintiff,

vs.

JOHN T. REEVES, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to JOHN T. REEVES, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion and wilful neglect, and determining and adjudging that plaintiff is the owner of the certain real property described in the complaint herein, as her separate property, and also for alimony and counsel fees; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 23d day of July, A. D. 1909.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE ON SALE OF REAL PROPERTY

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 7926, Department 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of JOHN GEHERTY, Deceased.

CECELIA GEHERTY, the Administratrix of the Will annexed of the Estate of JOHN GEHERTY, deceased, having heretofore presented to the Court and filed with the Clerk thereof her verified petition praying for an Order of this Court authorizing, empowering and directing her to sell certain real property, in said petition particularly described, belonging to the estate of said deceased, and it appearing to the Court that it is necessary to sell the whole of the real property in said petition described, to pay the debts outstanding against the said deceased, and the debts, expenses and charges of administration and the family allowance, and that it is for the advantage, benefit and best interest of the estate and those interested therein that said real estate be sold:

It is hereby ordered that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased be, and they are hereby directed to appear before the above-entitled Court in the Courtroom of Department No. 10 thereof, in the Grant Building, Southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on Monday, the 25th day of October, A. D. 1909, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. of said day, to then and there show cause, if any they have, why an order should not be granted to said Administratrix with the Will annexed, for the sale of all said real property.

It is further ordered that a copy of this Order to Show Cause be published in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation, printed and published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, once a week for four (4) successive weeks.

Dated, San Francisco, September 16, A. D. 1909.

The Festival

In the midst of the Portola Festival, as we are at this writing, with the bands playing and the carnival colors floating bravely and defiantly in humid breezes, and all the exhilarating evidences of mock pomp and romantic ceremony gladdening the multitudinous lovers of pageantry, we find some difficulty in detaching ourselves from the spirit of the occasion to reflect on the perversity of that obtrusive element of the community into which it is almost impossible to infuse the essence of civic enthusiasm. The Portola Festival is a success. It is a success beyond the dreams of the most optimistic organizers of the joyous spectacle. And it is a success in despite of the discouraging attitude of certain lympathtic and lugubrious gentlemen who, though they believe they have the interest of the city at heart, are congenitally indisposed to encourage the enterprise of such public spirited citizens as those that conceived the festival idea and effected the realization of their praiseworthy project. A few weeks ago the "knockers" were to be met wherever men do congregate. Of the tribe were some of our leading merchants who frowned at the approaching festivities, being, they said, unable to see of what benefit such folderol would be to San Francisco. The wiseacre who prides himself on his philosophic aloofness from the trivialities of life and who is utterly devoid of imagination scoffed at the promises of the festival promoters; and on all sides prophets of failure were heard lamenting the inevitable humiliation that would overwhelm us in the hour which folly had set aside for triumph. The old parish habit of pulling apart has survived the earthquake and fire, but we have reason to felicitate ourselves on the energy and optimism that conquer all difficulties. Of the Portola Festival we may well be proud. Judged merely from the standpoint of the materialist it was a prodigious success. If we derived from it nothing but publicity it was more than worth while. Millions of dollars would not suffice to pay at advertising rates for the publicity the Portola Festival has given us.

Our Loose Business Methods

Now it appears that the big municipal water system which is in process of development under the direction of our esteemed public servants is not to have its source of supply in the Hetch-Hetchy Valley. It appears that we have been misled by a misnomer. Secretary Ballinger informs us that we have a permit to utilize the waters of Lake Eleanor for municipal purposes and are not to be allowed to do any engineering work in the Hetch-Hetchy Valley unless the source to which we now have access is inadequate. On this point there is no dispute. The Mayor and the Supervisors and their engineers admit that Secretary Ballinger's statement of the case is correct. They regard it as of no consequence that our right to the Hetch-Hetchy Valley source is a matter of contingency. We are not prepared to say that they are not justified in taking this view of the situation, but we should certainly be better satisfied with a prospect that presented no shadow of a cloud. We feel that though it is only the money of the taxpayers that is to be spent on this municipal water system, we should act upon the same principles to which business men adhere in the management of their private affairs. The haphazard style of doing business usually leads to bankruptcy. Yet this is the style which we have adopted in the handling of this great municipal enterprise. The indications are that we are building on shifting sands. If our engineers should eventually pronounce Lake Eleanor inadequate for our purposes would their judgment be accepted as final? Suppose that engineers employed by the national government should find that our engineers had failed to exhaust the potentialities of Lake Eleanor, what then? These are questions which suggest themselves after casual consideration of the matter. Perhaps they were inspired by an unjustifiable lack of confidence in the gentlemen who have undertaken this big water project. Perhaps these gentlemen have the situation well in hand, and are not given to imprudence. We hope so, but as there is powerful opposition to this water project not only from private, selfish interests but also from zealous sentimentalists who conceive that it would be a great outrage to sacrifice the beauties of the Hetch-Hetchy Valley to utilitarian purposes, it would seem to be the part of wisdom to insure ourselves against molestation before rushing blindly ahead and perhaps incurring disaster. To proceed on the theory that the authorities at Washington will never dare to interfere in a matter of vital importance to the people of this city seems to us in the nature of folly. The sentimentalists who believe that the great natural wonders of this country should be safeguarded against desecration are more numerous than the people of San Francisco; and some of them are already pointing out that as the Hetch-Hetchy is not the only source of an adequate water supply in the Sierras it is not of vital importance to us that we should be permitted to mar a sublime landscape.

A Powerful Protestant

One of the most distinguished of the sentimentalists who have an abiding prejudice against our great water project is John Muir, a gentleman who has found perpetual youth in the woods, a true lover of nature whose intercourse with heaven and earth has become part of his daily food. John Muir is unalterably opposed to our plans for the marring of the tranquil Hetch-Hetchy landscape. Consequently the fathers of the so-called Hetch-Hetchy project abominate John Muir. They were shocked when they learned that he was to be Secretary Ballinger's companion in the Yosemite, and with vehement protests they sought to dissuade the Cabinet officer from subjecting himself to the seductive influence of the aged geologist. Now John Muir is an enemy to be reckoned with. While he lives we shall have to fight every inch of the way into the Hetch-Hetchy, and the probability is that he will survive Jimmy Phelan and all Jimmy's puppets, for he is constantly renewing his youth in the Sierras, the air of which is a cordial of incredible virtue. We cannot hope to silence John Muir with abuse. Nor can we bring to bear stronger influence than that which he wields. There is no man in San Francisco half so well known as John Muir. There are lovers of John Muir in every corner of the world. We venture to say that a message of ten words to the people from this old poet of the wilderness would have a more profound effect than a whole library of addresses from the Mayor of San Francisco. When the newspapers of this city were emitting characteristic yawps expressive of their disapproval of Muir as a companion of Mr. Taft, the leading journals of the east were congratulating the President on having fallen into such good hands, and some of them took occasion to dwell affectionately on the charms and virtues of the Dunbar Scotsman, who, as one of them said, "cannot pass from memory so long as endures the vast Alaskan glacier named after him." How unfortunate for San Francisco that John Muir should have constituted himself the guardian of the Hetch-Hetchy Valley!

Protestantism In Latin Countries

It would seem that the hopes perennially entertained by Protestant missionaries of supplanting Catholicism in the Latin countries of Europe have never mounted so high in the breasts of the ladies—God bless them all—engaged in that stupendous task as at present. This judgment one may rightly form by perusing the reports of the proceedings of the Interdenominational Institute for Women's Foreign Missionary Societies which sat recently in Boston. The name of the institute is lengthy and cumbersome but its aims are single and straightforward. Briefly stated they are to convince the sons and daughters of France, Spain and Italy of the errors to which they are committed by submission to the papacy and to turn their footsteps into the pathways that lead to the numerous evangelical churches. It does not appear that the institute discriminates between Episcopalianism and Methodism, between the Congregationalists and the Baptists, between Presbyterianism and the other sects into which Protestantism is divided; the great thing is apparently to carve these fair countries out of the dominions which acknowledge the religious primacy of Rome. The deliberations of the institute were characterized by a most optimistic spirit. In Italy, it seems, the ancient sect of Waldensians in the north and the Methodists in the south are slowly but surely closing in upon Rome itself. In France a great movement toward Protestantism has been discovered; the people, it appears, are hungering for "a religion of earnestness and truth." In Spain, according to one speaker, three things are dragging down the nation, political corruption, a bad government and a wrong colonial theory; but the intimation was conveyed that all these evils would be cured by the spread of Protestantism. We take the liberty to doubt much of this. We do not think that the religious genius of Latin Europe holds forth much encouragement to the blithe propagandists of Protestantism. In fact a tolerable familiarity with religious conditions in these three countries convinces us that the efforts of the interdenominational institute have largely gone for naught; some of their missionaries have acknowledged as much. So we are sorry to see these good ladies wasting valuable effort on a hopeless task. There is so much other good missionary work to be done, work the outcome of which is infinitely more certain than the attempt to protestantize Italy, France and Spain. If we are not mistaken the United States swarm with people who have no religion at all; why not devote more attention to these unfortunates and let Latin Europe shift for its own salvation? We are afraid the good ladies who met in Boston are imbued with the futile enthusiasm which prompted a certain protestant bishop to set about the conversion of the Pope.

When Not To Debate

When Charles M. Fickert declined to meet the Hon. Francis J. Heney in public debate he enunciated as the basis of his declination a principle that has been approved in polite society since the days of Aristotle. The soundness of this principle is not to be gainsaid. It is a moral principle, and is appreciated by every man of honor bred in and faithful to the traditions and obligations of a gentleman. It is the same principle that has always made it impossible for a gentleman to meet a rogue on the field of honor. A moral principle that has held good under the code duello is surely not to be abandoned in that higher sphere where the intellect holds sway; nay, it is of prime importance that in this sphere the principle be adhered to, for an honest man in an intellectual contest if he has a rogue for an adversary is at an enormous disadvantage. The purpose of debate is the advancement of truth, but, as Aristotle says, persons who are devoid of self-respect do not cherish truth and are not just enough to bear being proved to be in the wrong, and for that reason the old philosopher advised his disciples to avoid controversy with them. Now suppose that Mr. Fickert, who is presumed to be intellectually honest, since his character has never been impugned, should enter into debate with Mr. Heney, who is known to have absolutely no regard for the truth, what in all likelihood would be the result? Mr. Fickert, assuming that gentleman to be absolutely free from intellectual dishonesty, would confine himself in all the propositions he advanced to the strict truth. Mr. Heney, on the other hand, it is fair to assume, would pursue his usual method of controversy and overwhelm his adversary with such impromptu fabrications as were rendered expedient during the progress of the debate. Mr. Heney unquestionably is skilled in the art of attaining the appearance of truth regardless of its substance, and before a large and illiterate audience he is a dangerous antagonist. How little regard he has for the truth may be ascertained by reviewing some of his past polemical performances. When he first began boiling on the bema for the advancement of his employer's interests he explained that the Supervisors were granted immunity because they were the ignorant tools of perennial corruptionists. He said that to purify our government we should make an example of the men who tempt and seduce our public servants. It was not so vicious, he said, to receive as to give a bribe. About a year later we find Mr. Heney giving an entirely different explanation of the course pursued by the graft prosecution. Having been accused of discriminating against Patrick Calhoun and others to gratify the vindictiveness of his employer, he said, and he has reiterated, that it was first intended to give the higher-ups immunity, to enter into friendly relations with the infamous bribe-givers and prosecute the poor, ignorant men who had been seduced. That this plan was not carried out, Mr. Heney would now have us believe, was entirely due to the stubborness of the higher-ups who would not come in with their testimony and accept immunity. Thus, we see, there are two irreconcilable versions of the plan of campaign, and both of them from the same high authority, from the shifty Mr. Heney who is consumed with a passion for debate. A short time ago this same resourceful individual, while in Seattle, explained for publication that some of the payments made to him out of the Federal treasury were deferred because a certain fund had been exhausted. Since his return to town he has said in explanation of the circumstance that has excited suspicion that he had not been paid promptly because, owing to pressure of work, he had neglected to put in his bill. From all of which, we submit, assuming that Aristotle is a worthy guide, no person who is likely to be hampered by scruples should rush into a debate with the Hon. Francis J. Heney.

Perspective Impressions

The test of every political reform is the principal which it tends to establish. If the principle is immoral the reform is criminal.

Not because of the craze for reform spelling but for reasons made obvious by recent episodes in the criminal courts let us spell the Christian name of Johnson the vociferous H-i-r-e-h-i-m.

Even in the midst of our festivities the Hon. Francis J. Heney flows copiously on, but steeped as we are in the full tide of pleasure life is wearing a midsummer night's dream aspect for us and a nightmare is impossible.

The Boughten Bulletin is terribly excited at the prospect of P. H. McCarthy's election. What a stinging rebuke the election of the Labor candidate would be to the longest-leased journal and its malevolent masters!

Nothing short of a dynamite outrage personally conducted by that distinguished stage manager, the Hon. William J. Burns, can save the day for the bad man from Arizona. One year's subscription to Town Talk for the person who guesses the frame-up now in process of incubation.

The Portola Festival reminds us that even in real life there are many grave personages who take themselves seriously, but who are mere puppets, marionettes, strutting solemnly through a fantastic show, deceiving the multitude with gewgaws that are offered as things of great price.

Don Nicholas Covarrubias looks the part of the old heroes who had their steel helmet and plume of feathers, the glittering spear and shield, the barbed steed and the spread banner, and performed their knightly service in joust and tournament. At nightly banquet service Don Nicholas himself is said to be better than a raw hand.

Army Reform in China

Being An Account of the Achievements of Yuan Shih-Kai Who Was Shorn of His Station Before He Had Time to Make a Military Power of Japan's Somnolent Neighbor

By Robert Bartlett

Some of our statesmen at Washington appear to be of the opinion that army reform has made such progress in China that before long it will be worth our while to make an ally of her and use her as a sort of set-off to Japan in the Far East. This is a vain delusion. Though China has a well-equipped modern army she is very far from being a military power of serious importance in the political calculations of the rest of the world.

A FIGHTER OF THE OLD REGIME
("Down with Foreigners" inscribed on his banner)

The work of reforming the Chinese army on modern lines began after the war with Japan which exposed the hollowness of the system existing at that time. To Yuan Shih-Kai was intrusted the task of creating a new army, and he established a large camp and training ground at Tsirian. He engaged some German officers as instructors, and as the basis of his reform measures he announced that the men who enlisted in his force should be well and regularly paid. This was quite a new departure in Chinese governmental proceedings as the old "braves" were never paid at all but only allowed to pay themselves at the expense of the civil population. This practice explains why a standing army was always unpopular in China. After four years Yuan had raised a well-trained force, the discipline of which was highly commended by everyone who inspected it, and it was the support he gave as the commander of the only formidable body of troops in China to the late Empress Dowager that crushed the reform movement of Kang Yu-wei. At that time the force he had with the colors was not more than 10,000 strong, but in 1900 at the time of the Boxer movement it was credibly believed that he could put 30,000 trained men and an adequate artillery force in the field. There was much anxiety at Tientsin as to what would happen if he threw in his lot with the organizers of the Boxer movement; but for some reason, never fully explained, he stood aside, kept his force well in hand, and watched the course of events. After the trouble with the Powers ended Yuan was appointed Viceroy of Pechili, and he at once took in hand the reorganization of the large garrison of the metropolitan province on the same lines as he had followed in Shantung.

When war broke out between Russia and Japan in 1904 it was widely reported that he had under his orders a thoroughly-organized and well-trained force of not less than 70,000 men. A large part of this army was stationed in camps along the railway north of Pekin to Shan-hai-Kuan, and when it became clear that Japan was to be victorious the Chinese Government collected a large corps in order to be in readiness to reoccupy Manchuria on its evacuation by the belligerents. It was entirely due to the efforts of Yuan that China was thus in a position to show that she possessed the armed force needed for the preservation of order in a region which had just been the scene of a long and sanguinary war. But one of the consequences of the recovery of Manchuria was to prove fatal to Yuan Shih Kai, who had alone rendered it possible. The force which he had raised and equipped, and which constitutes China's modern army, for service under his orders at and near Pekin was broken up; that is to say, the greater part of it was moved into Manchuria, where it has since constituted the permanent garrison. Yuan's own position was thus greatly weakened, and after the

A NEW CHINESE BATTERY IN POSITION

A Connemara Tragedy

By Filson Young

On a recent afternoon a little party straggled along a Connemara road, and then struck into the mountains. It consisted of, first, two constables, then a peasant woman, then another constable and the sergeant, then the local magistrate who is also the local hotel keeper, his son and clerk, the doctor and myself. The peasant woman was in custody for having that morning struck her mother-in-law, an old woman nearly eighty years of age, over the head with a pair of tongs; and as the old woman was thought to be dying the magistrate was going to take her deposition. So we climbed the mountains, no formality being observed, the prisoner walking a quarter of a mile away from her warders, and all of us intent upon our footing as we strode or leaped from stone to stone, or skirted a brown spongy patch of bog. Then we came to the "village"—four cabins hanging on the mountain side, each no bigger than the inside of a motor-omnibus, and each the centre of a tiny cultivated patch of land, where poor little fragments of crops feebly waved among the rocks. No road or path—just these four cabins and their little plots looking down over the lake-studded plain that lies between these southern hills and the great soaring inland mountains.

We stooped and went into the cabin in which the persons of the drama had their home. In a corner by the peat fire the poor old victim lay groaning on a heap of rags on the earth floor. Her son, a weak, complaining creature, sat beside her holding her hand. The prisoner, his wife—a patient, intelligent woman with a face of strength and suffering—sat on a box opposite to them. No greetings were exchanged. Her two children—beautiful little creatures with dark hair and great violet eyes—sat solemnly and speechlessly together on a tiny bench. The rest of us were crowded somehow into the bare, clean little hut, which was furnished only with a dresser, a table, two chairs, a box and a bench. A few chickens cheeped gently among our feet, and on a bed of heather at the far end of the room the family cow rustled and sighed. We kept both doors open for light and air, and while the doctor was making his examination I learned the facts.

It was the familiar situation of mother-in-law and daughter-in-law, contracted here into the space of a few square yards. Ten years ago this old woman's son, John let us call him, married this pretty Margaret from another county. She was an heiress, and brought him a dowry of fifty pounds. Old Mary, the mother, resented her coming into the house; old as she was, she still intended to be mistress; but until the fifty pounds was spent they all lived together; the man gave up all attempts at work, and loafed and drank and bullied the wife on whose money he was living. Then—after who knows what shame and suffering in body and mind?—she ran away alone to America, and there lived and worked for two years, regularly sending home money to husband and children—for she had left the two little ones behind her in her flight. She bore a third child soon after she left home; and I suppose the pull of the other children drew her back again, for she returned last winter. Since then there had been continual squabbles and fightings; she had twice to seek the protection of the police from her husband; and on the morning of the tragedy things came to a climax. She was baking a cake of bread for the children's breakfast; the old woman, who did not want bread herself and could not bear that anyone else should have it, threw the cake into the fire. The daughter-in-law turned on her and struck at her with the tongs; they came down on her head, cutting it badly; the son struck at his wife and caught his mother as she fell. The police were sent for, and the prisoner was marched off four miles to the barracks, whence she had now been marched back, presently to be marched to the barracks again—twelve miles' walking—driven five miles in a car to the station, and taken by train to Galway Jail—another two hours' journey: and all day without food. It was indeed a singular circumstance that none of the persons in the drama had eaten anything all that day. The old woman, who had lost a lot of blood and was now very low, was sinking from exhaustion; the son had not made any attempt to feed her or himself. I asked him if there was any milk in the house. "Ah, no, your honor; it's too poor I am to have any milk," he whined; but the prisoner said calmly, "There's some in that cup on the dresser, sir." "Have you an egg?" I asked him. "Ah, niver a one, sir, at all." I looked at the prisoner. "You'll find one under the basin, sir." We beat up the egg in some milk for the old woman, who took a little very reluctantly; and later, when I asked the son if she had finished it, he said she had. "Get up and let me see what you're hiding there." He rose and disclosed the mug, still half full. "Ah, and it's ill in meself I am, your honor, and after needing something to put strength in me." It was only by reference to old-age pensions, wrapped up in an assumption of his love of his mother, that one was able to convince him of the importance of keeping her alive.

The doctor's report being unfavorable, the depositions were taken, much confusion being caused by the ill-put questions of the sergeant. It was something like this—the old woman answering in mournful, wailing, but beautiful broken tones:

Sergeant: "How were you feeling in yourself this morning, Mary?"

Mary: "Oh, it was wake, wake, I was."

Sergeant: "But were ye any waker than usual?" (Question repeated.)

Mary: "It's wake this long time I've been."

Clerk (reading): "I, Mary Manisty, got up early this morning, being in my usual health—"

Sergeant: "Now tell us what happened. Come, on, now; what happened next?"

Mary: "That woman shtruck at me with the tongs, and I'd been kilt only for me son, and—"

Prisoner (rapidly): "Sure I went to put a cake on the fire for the children, and I niver wished the old woman any harrm, and me goin' in fear of me life of that man ever since I came home, and had to run out of the bed from him lasht night, an' I just gave her a tip with the tongs, an' I didn't mean to hurrt her at all."

Sergeant: "Whisht, woman. "You'll be able to tell your story in court." (Producing the tongs: "Is this the tongs she shtruck ye with, Mary?"

Mary (whimpering): "Shure it is, your honor, and she'd a kilt me—"

Sergeant: "Where did she shtrike ye?"

Mary (undoing her bandages): "Here, your honor, and I niver wanted her in the house at all, and it's me own house me husband left me—"

Sergeant: "What part of the tongs did she shtrike ye with?"

Prisoner (pointing): "With that part, sir."

Sergeant: "Whisht, woman, now." (To Mary): "Did she shtrike you with the shoulder of the tongs?"

Mary (crying): "On me head."

Sergeant: "But was it with the shoulder of the tongs she hit ye?"

Do you know what Quality means in a Turkish Cigarette? If not get a box of "MILO." Then, any other cigarette, and try same, side by side. You'll note the delicate, aromatic mildness of the "MILO." Mildness (yet with the richness in flavor) is what costs in Turkish Tobacco, and its just this that makes the Perfect Cigarette. You'll find it in No Other.

The Spectator

A Neglected Poet

"In the modern arrangements of society," said Carlyle speaking of Bobbie Burns, "it is no uncommon thing that a man of genius must ask for bread and receive a stone," and he added that while "the inventor of a spinning-jenny is pretty sure of his reward in his own day the writer of a true poem like the apostle of a true religion is nearly as sure of the contrary." I have been reminded of these sentiments by the pitiable plight of Louis A. Robertson, who has written many a true poem, and who has endured and is enduring greater sufferings than any poet who has lived since the days of Job. The history of the republic of letters is full of instances of the indifference of the world to the wretchedness of poets as well as of the tardy efforts of mankind to do justice in the market place by means of costly monuments to genius that had been ostracized in ignorance and hooted forth in folly. The divine Homer had to beg his way through the cities of Greece; Chatterton to save himself from death through hunger took poison and was thrown like a pauper into the burial ground of Shoe-lane workhouse; Keats, spurned and persecuted in his lifetime, from a distant grave influenced thought in his native land which he left in proud despair; Bobbie Burns, to whom splendid monuments have been reared in many lands, died in the prime of his life miserable and neglected. These are but a few of the notable instances that corroborate what Carlyle has said. And now we have one in our very midst, and at the risk of causing a jangling discord amid the sweet harmonies of a mad, glad festival week I have resolved to make a few comments thereon.

His Pitiable Plight

Quite well do I know that there are many people who can conceive of no reason why the miseries of a poet should excite greater compassion than those of any other mortal, or why a singer of eternal songs who cannot transmute them into the coin of the realm should have any claim on our indulgence or inspire in us the sentiment of gratitude. To these people I do not address myself with reference to the poor poet who now languishes on a bed of pain which he can never leave except to make the melancholy journey to the grave. Only to those persons do I address myself who regard all true poets as sacred historians of the heart, and who believe that even poets of the smallest voice are worthy of worship because they have talked with God. To these sympathetic ones appeals have been made in behalf of Robertson at intervals for several years, and some have responded, but the poet is again destitute save for a small monthly allowance made by a generous friend which is not sufficient to pay the invalid's expenses in Dr. Long's Sanitarium. Robertson, being a victim of ataxia in the last stages of that dreadful disease, is absolutely helpless, and now the wretchedness of his plight is aggravated by the haunting dread of being sent to a public institution to die.

In Bohemia

One by one the friends of other days have ceased to visit the bedridden poet, and now he is denied the companionship of the most loyal of all his comforters—his books,—for he is too feeble to read. Nothing but his pipe remains to relieve the tedium of year-long days, but the poet spiritualized by sixteen years of excruciating torture, submits to his fate with saint-like tranquillity, uttering never a word of complaint, speaking always tenderly of the men that were his friends, betraying no symptom of the gloom that environs him. In all probability the Bohemian Club will some day take cognizance of Robertson's plight. Before the fire, and at odd times since, I believe, the club rendered him assistance, but of late he seems to be entirely forgotten by the men who enjoyed his beautiful poetic drama, "Montezuma," which he wrote for the Midsummer Jinks and out of which some of the club's best traditions have been fashioned. Robertson is one of the men to whom the Bohemian Club has been more or less indebted in recent years for the flavor of bohemianism which still lingers in the home of that organization. The Bohemian Club, be it known, while not exactly devoted to the bohemianism that was a survival of the medievalism that knew the joy and romance of existence in the days when war was a game instead of a science, is nevertheless intent upon keeping alive the spirit that was a revolt against the vulgar ideal of gaining and accumulating money. The Bohemian Club is supposed to cultivate a repugnance to the life that is made dull, drab and prosaic by commerce, and to that end it welcomes to membership poets and painters whose presence gives color to the idea that even in a well-fed Bohemia are tolerated men who are broke and unashamed, and who, like the original Bohemians, starve when they have nothing and drink when they have money. How near the Bohemian Club comes to simulating the true bohemian flavor I am unable to say, but I am quite sure that among its members are cultivated the true bohemian qualities of good-fellowship, generosity and unselfishness, and therefore I have no doubt that their emotions will be stirred by the tragic plight of the author of "Montezuma."

The Case of Sheridan

Incidentally it may not be taken amiss to remark that the club can hardly afford to defer action, hoping to make amends by doing posthumous honors to a Bohemian poet. That was what was done in the case of Richard Brinsley Sheridan by members of the British nobility upon whose conduct Sir Samuel Romilly commented in his diary, thus giving inspiration for these verses written by J. Sydney Taylor:

They fled from thee—all the gay, titled and proud,
When thy evening of life in the dreariness came,
They fled from thee—all who had joined with the crowd
To echo thy praises in thy morning of fame.

To thy bed-side unbless'd came the harpies whose fangs
Were rudest and sharpest in fortune's decay,
And of all who should soften the victim's last pangs,
None scared the foul birds from their desolate prey.

In loneliness wither'd the spirit that shed
The eloquent charms that might Senates command,
Who the mask and the pageant and revelry led,
And waved over fashion a magical wand.

Not lonely—one minist'ring angel was there!
Oh, woman! how faithful, how changeless thou art
To the man of thy love; tho' his eye gleam despair,
And a wilderness gather its gloom round the heart.

The struggle is over—the mutes at the gate,
And the recreant grandeur which struck the worst blow
Thy spirit had felt, ere it bowed to its fate,
Now follows thy bier in the trappings of woe.

Oh faithless such chivalry!—ye who rely
On its promise, behold! how its friendship could spurn
Misfortune's last claim, and leave genius to die,
And then, with late homage, embrace his cold urn!

They throng'd round his hearse who had let him despair,
Like an outcast, too mean and too worthless to save;
Who cheer'd not his gloom with one ray of the heart,
And throw the vain splendor of pomp on his grave!

With bards rest thy ashes, whose fate like thy own,
Was neglect from the proud in life's cheerless decay;
Who were left unbefriended, to wither alone,
By those who strewed flowers on their passionless clay!

A Great Man Rebuked

The Hon. Barclay Henley, a lawyer and a patriot, compelled by circumstances to labor more industriously as a patriot than as a lawyer, made public confession the other day of the fact that but a few weeks ago he was rebuked for the first time in his life. This confession touched the springs of emotion, affecting Mr. Henley's hearers deeply and exciting their profound commiseration. Who, they asked themselves, had dared to rebuke so great and virtuous a man as Mr. Henley? The lawyer and patriot did not keep them long in suspense, though he knows as well as any playwright that suspense is an essential element of all dramatic entertainments. The rebuke, he said, was administered, by the sagest of her sex, the illustrious Mrs. Gerberding, chief evangelist of the muliebrious political organization dedicated to the greater glory of the Hon. Francis J. Heney. At once the audience was assuaged. For was not the rebuke sanctified at its source? Who is better qualified to administer a rebuke to a mere man than this female apostle of righteousness not less distinguished for her learning than the beautiful Hypatia, daughter of Leon the philosopher, the prodigy of her age and the glory of her sex?

Her Veiled Flattery

It was with no touch of humiliation, I hasten to explain, that Mr. Henley made public confession of the Gerberding rebuke. Quite the contrary. Mr. Henley was gratified beyond expression at having exposed himself to the benign reproach of so charming a woman, especially as in the circumstances of the matter was implied a compliment of considerable magnitude. It appears that Mrs. Gerberding rebuked Mr. Henley for having attended a banquet given by the Bar Association at which Chief Justice Beatty was a guest. From this it is clear that Mrs. Gerberding has a very high opinion of Mr. Henely. Apparently she believes that were a mark of Barclay Henley's disesteem to be visited upon our venerable Chief Justice the latter would never be able to recover from the shock. And apparently, too, the Hon. Barclay Henley's opinion of the prodigious potentialities of his disfavor coincides with that of the learned and sweet-tempered lady by whom he was so generously rebuked; for in closing his impressive recital he said that he admired Mrs. Gerberding for her sentiments. To be sure he does. Did ever susceptible man fail to admire the woman that entertained an absurdly flattering opinion of him?

Her Vague Explanation

Mrs. Gerberding herself was in attendance at the meeting on the occasion of Mr. Henley's confession, and she took occasion to explain that she had not intended that he should regard her animadversion on his conduct as a rebuke at all. To make clear what her intention was she added, "But it wasn't because Chief Justice Beatty was a chief justice anymore than if he had been the most humble jailer in the employ of the judiciary that I said that." This appears to be a case of employing words to darken understanding. The only thing made clear by this speech is that Mrs. Gerberding failed to elucidate. What she said gives me the impression of being in the nature of a malapropism. Is it conceivable that so exalted a personage as Mr. Henley would eat at the same table with a vulgar jailer? Perish the thought! And join with Mr. Henley in pardoning the ineptitude.

The Sense That Might Have Saved Her

But let us respectfully open the porches of our ears to the sagest of her sex: "It was because he (Justice Beatty) rendered such a ridiculous, inane and absurd decision in regard to Mr. Schmitz when he said that the indictment was faulty because it was not stated therein that he was mayor of this city, when a mere child knows that the law considers what is common knowledge to go without saying, and the law may be interpreted that way, and I think when a man in his high position renders such a decision as that, it is the privilege of every man, woman and child in America to refuse to sit at the same table with him." All of which proves, if it proves anything, that Mrs. Gerberding is a woman who thinks she knows what she is talking about. It also proves that notwithstanding her active participation in public affairs of late she is still a womanly woman inasmuch as she is more impulsive than logical. Philosophers say that reason is the exclusive property of man and hence that woman is obliged to depend on the guidance of instinct and emotion. Mrs. Gerberding serves to exemplify this theory. With her belief is not the result of an intellectual process. She has an invincible knowledge which comes in spontaneous rushes of emotion, and when, as in this instance, she exhibits the maximum of conviction with the minimum of argument she actually believes that her conclusion is self-evident. A talented woman and a zealous reformer, Mrs. Gerberding has struggled hard, I am told, to cultivate her mental powers, but it is evident that she has neglected the saving sense of humor, else she would not have been able to administer that rebuke to the Hon. Barclay Henley without laughing in his face; nor would she have presumed to pose as a Bluestocking Blackstone without winking the other eye. Shakespeare gave us a Portia but he did not impose on our credulity by having the lady overrule the State's highest tribunal.

A Newspaper Tragedy

As colorful as the bedizened streets of our gay city were the pages of our daily papers during the progress of the carnival. On epochal occasions such as this the editors of our daily journals feel that it behooves them to impress the groundlings, not only with their news-gathering facilities but with the literary powers of their special writers, and to that end restless and versatile masters of journalese and accomplished artists in descriptive narrative, are given full swing with instructions to spread the rich emanations of their fertile minds over the space alloted to them. Hence the pomp and purple of prose with which we were edified during the week, the artillery of words and the battery of resounding rhetorical conceits. Every journal presented its series of historical monographs, abounding in epigrams, shrewd observations and polished periods. The spectacle of the dailies vying with one another in a spectacular literary tournament was as emotionalizing, as Mr. Edgar Saltus would say, as the Portola pageant itself. But there was a tragic side to it, which doubtless was beyond the ken of the average observer, and it remains for me, faithful chronicler of provincial events, to rescue this one salient incident of newspaper rivalry from oblivion and preserve it in printer's ink for posterity.

Hearst and the Catholic Church

That the poignancy of this newspaper tragedy may be apprehended it is necessary to explain that for some months Mr. Hearst has been employing all the ingenuity on his exuberant pay-roll to assuage the animosities that were roused against him by the publication of a cartoon and an editorial offensive to that powerful institution the Catholic Church. The editorial reflected the sentiments of the Socialists of Spain who, like the Socialists of France and the Socialists everywhere else, are opposed to the Catholic Church because it stands for law and order, whether law and order be symbolized by a crown or maintained under the Constitution of a republic. The offensive cartoon represented the Pope as in the Down and Out Club. Now there are many ardent Catholics in this country who regarded the attitude of the Hearst journals as indicated by the Socialistic editorial and the irreverent cartoon as insulting, and here in San Francisco they have been retaliating through an organization the purpose of which is to reduce the number of the Examiner's subscribers. To offset the influence of this organization the Examiner has been converted into an unofficial organ of the Catholic Church. The Examiner has devoted more space to affairs of interest to Catholics of late than to all other religious institutions combined. Nothing so strikingly illustrated the Examiner's belated zeal as a coddler of Catholics as its alertness in soliciting subscriptions for the Youths' Directory immediately after the accident to Father Crowley. Now for the tragedy of the carnival.

The Poignancy Of It

One of the big events of last Tuesday was the celebration of pontifical high mass in St. Mary's Cathedral in honor of the discovery of San Francisco bay. Judged in cold blood as to its news value, as most occurrences are judged in newspaper offices, this mass, celebrated by representatives of the institution that planted the cross of Christian civilization on this peninsula, was certainly worthy of considerable space in any daily paper. From the standpoint of the Examiner, in view of Mr. Hearst's eagerness to regain the esteem of Catholics, it was deserving of exceptional exploitation. But in the excitement of the moment it was virtually forgotten. Indeed, it was worse than forgotten; it was treated as though it were unworthy the attention of a special writer. A measly half-column of space was given to it, and it was written up by a reporter of such little importance that he has yet to achieve the proud privilege of having his name attached to his literary performances. That superb stylist Edgar Saltus who might have done justice to the gorgeous and impressive ceremony was sent about town to get inspiration from "pretty girls, girls without price," from "frocks that covered so many virtues and cost so many doubloons" and from "hats which a harsh word would have ruined." Alas, poor Saltus! But the Examiner's dereliction might have passed unnoticed had it not been for the vigilance of its feeble and despised contemporary, the senile Call, which is also a zealous bidder for Catholic patronage. The Spreckels journal devoted a whole page beautifully illustrated to the ceremony. Therein lies the tragedy of it. Furthermore, what an unidentified reporter was assigned to write up for the Examiner, the Call deemed worthy of the powers of Rufus Steele, editor of the Sunday Supplement. The Examiner scooped the Call with a picture of Mayor Taylor bathing his whiskers in wine between the King and the Queen. The Call scooped the Examiner with a picture of the scene on the altar of St. Mary's Cathedral.

"Speaking of omens," he said, "not long ago I read of a cashier who dreamed that he was murdered while protecting the funds of the bank and that an angel carried him off to heaven. The very next night he was—"

"Murdered?" she interrupted with a shiver.

"No; he was on his way to Honduras."

Miss Bogue's Mistake

While I am not a finicky stickler for the minutiae of historial events, I must own to a certain deep-seated penchant for the careful usage of words; hence it was with a distinct shock that I discovered Queen Vergilia discoursing in one of the dailies of "Portola, the navigator." I cannot imagine that Miss Bogue's knowledge of the historical event which we have been celebrating is at fault and I take it that the direst punishment ever inflicted for lese majeste would be none too severe for the discourteous native who would dare to suggest that our Queen of Beauty had not mastered the historical monograph compiled by Mr. Zoeth S. Eldredge. Nowhere in that interesting booklet is it intimated that Don Gaspar ever exposed himself to the danger of mal de mer; he was every inch a landlubber. Miss Bogue cannot be ignorant of this fact, so I am forced to suppose that her use of the word navigator was a queenly slip of the pen due to confused memories of the Golden Gate and the beautiful bay on whose blue expanses Don Gaspar never ventured. I reject with scorn the suggestion of a friend that Queen Vergilia used the term in its slangy sense to pay oblique tribute to Don Gaspar's ability as a wine-bibber. No doubt the worthy old don liked his bottle of prime Canary but history has failed to tell whether he "navigated" gracefully after a night's potations or carried his liquor ignobly. So that explanation of Miss Bogue's reference to "Portola, the navigator" does not go down with me.

The Partington Portrait of Miss Bogue

Those who have had the pleasure of studying the portrait of Queen Vergilia executed by Miss Gertrude Partington are loud in their praises of its artistry. Miss Bogue proved a picturesque subject and the painter was careful to accentuate those salient characteristics of her personality which have made her an ideal mistress of the revels. The color scheme of gold and pure vermillion is audacious and in the hands of a less skillful artist would have invited disaster. Bizarre this colorful combination certainly is not and the painter has managed so well that the red and gold motive of the dress is properly subordinated to the brilliant personality of the sitter; in fact it becomes but sober garniture against the superb flesh coloring. The pose is characteristic, the head thrown back, the body bent slightly forward, the whole attitude suggesting queenly graciousness. The work is a contribution to art of which California may well be proud.

Santos Dumont Once More

Letters which I have just received from a friend who is sojourning in Paris contain an infinite deal of aviation gossip. The whole of France went wild over that marvelous week at Rheims and effervescent Paris is still bubbling about aeroplanes and sky-storms. My correspondent speaks at considerable length of the return of Santos Dumont to the limelight, having witnessed his remarkable flight in his tiny aeroplane recently. But I am afraid my friend is more interested in the personality of the pioneer aerialist than in the structure of his flying machine for of the latter subject his letter has nothing to say. Probably we of San Francisco feel about the same way because of Santos Dumont's romantic attachment to Mrs. Spencer Eddy when she was Miss Lurline Spreckels. According to my friend in Paris appearances are all against Santos Dumont; nobody would take him for an inventor or credit him with particular daring. He is a tall thin young man of a somewhat feminine appearance and he would hardly be noticed in a crowd of people; but a few moments' conversation with him show the stuff he is made of. He has great knowledge of men and affairs and manners of the utmost courtliness; hence his great popularity. But that he is eccentric cannot be denied, for I learn that, aside from flying, his great hobby is—embroidering! It seems that he regards this feminine accomplishment as a great relaxation and my correspondent says that few women surpass him in doing fancy needle-work. Santos Dumont has another peculiarity. He never flies without his mascot which is a small medal presented to him by the Comtesse d'Eu. It must be admitted that he has been very lucky, whether owing to the medal or not, I would not presume to decide, for although he has had a number of nasty accidents, he has never been badly hurt.

She Placed Him on Exhibition

But returning to Santos Dumont's recent flight in his tiny aeroplane—ever since the up-to-date flying device displaced the dirigible balloon which was Santos Dumont's first love, the little aeronaut had been lost sight of in the lionizing of a new batch of sky-pilots. So when he soared aloft in an aeroplane and showed France and the rest of the world that he was keeping up with the scientific procession, everybody was delighted. He became a lion again and hostesses maneuvered skillfully to monopolize him. It remained for a clever American woman to cap the climax and she did it with a vengeance at a recent tea party in Paris. Observing what a great sensation the presence of the aviator was causing among her numerous guests and being a woman of wonderful resource, she determined that some of her charities should profit by the occasion. So she smilingly suggested to Santos Dumont that he should sit in the corner while all who wished to look at him should pay a small sum toward a fund for the poor of the neighborhood. The aviator saw the humor as well as the charitable intent of the scheme and for about a quarter of an hour a stream of enthusiasts passed before him while the charity reaped a small fortune. It is generally conceded that none but an American woman would have dared to do such a "stunt," even for sweet charity's sake.

A Strange French Writer

My correspondent in Paris has also sent me a budget of literary news and glancing over it I find no item more interesting than one which mentions the recrudescence of Leon Bloy. Who is Leon Bloy? Those who know their Paris thoroughly will remember that this strange writer has been publishing his "journal" at intervals of four or five years for the past twenty years. Paris has but one Leon Bloy and finds him picturesque but exceedingly disconcerting. Catulle Mendes who perished recently in a most shocking manner called him "a sewer endowed with hate." An avowed atheist in his young manhood, he later embraced Catholicity and for many years has claimed to be the last of the prophets, "the unique representative of absolute Catholicism in our epoch." He regards himself, or pretends to regard himself as a missionary charged with the duty of proclaiming the truth to a "generation of renegades" but in truth he is a universal scold and there is no depth of grossness of language to which he hesitates to descend. The latest volume of his journal, I am told, outbloys Bloy. He denounces, execrates and insults, usually by name, landlords ,chance acquaintances, former friends, journalists, publishers, lawyers, physicians, monks, priests, judges, politicians, presidents, kings and popes—everybody in fact whom he has ever met or of whom he has ever heard. He reminds one of that celebrated scene in which Huckleberry Finn's father, having stubbed his toe and barked his shin, outdid all his former efforts in cursing. But Bloy reserves his most scorching wrath and his choicest epithets for those of his fellow litterateurs who like him espoused Catholicism. These include Coppee, Brunetiere, Huysmans and Bourget. "The conversion of Huysmans," he writes in one of the mildest passages, "is the only one of all my works that succeeded and the one in which I take the least pride." If the author of "The Cathedral" were alive Bloy would not dare to say that. Bloy is not a great writer but his journal abounds in purple patches and its mordant personalities have given it a remarkable vogue.

What Leslie Carter's Career Means to Her

It is not often, I must confess, that I dip for mental stimulation into the pages of popular magazines, but at rare intervals of indulgence I do happen to extract a gem or two of ineffable humor. One such I have just unearthed and have experienced so much mirth in turning its splendaceous facets to the light that I cannot keep its brilliance to myself. I refer to an article written by Mrs. Leslie Carter under the title, "What My Career Means to Me," written by her, I say advisedly, for it is couched in the first person singular and bears the facsimile of her autograph and until proof is shown to the contrary, the dubious credit of the performance must rest with the actress whom David Belasco created. This article reveals the lady of the vermillion mane in several unsuspected roles, chief among which I hasten to acclaim that of the unconscious humorist. That person, I take it, is an unconscious humorist who regards himself with a degree of seriousness so unwarranted by his gifts or deeds that the assumption is excitant of sardonic laughter. That being so, the term fits Mrs. Carter as the bark the tree. What think you of an article wherein Mrs. Carter quotes Mrs. Browning, George Eliot, Doctor Johnson, Edward Fitzgerald, George Herbert and Rudyard Kipling as the springs of her lofty inspiration and devotes not a paragraph, not a line, not even an oblique word to David Belasco? Have we not in this omission alone proof positive that Mrs. Carter has deliberately falsified the meaning of her career or else has missed its significance through a myopic conceit that constitutes a veritable mummer's comedy worthy the laughter of gods and men?

"Du Barry's" Misgivings

Mrs. Carter starts with a pensive note. "I am afraid," she confesses, "that few, if any of us, are regarded as having high purposes or lofty aims. It is generally believed, I think, that the actor's life is chosen because it is more or less a life of pleasure, of freedom from care and irksome responsibility, and because it is imagined that there is some mysterious ethical force in the profession of players that relieves him, to a large extent, from the so-called 'conventions' which members of the less fortunate professions are forced to obey." This pondering of the "ethical force" which is supposed to release players from "the conventions," meaning, I take it, from the moral law, is delicious coming from a stern moralist like Mrs. Carter. But I must do Mrs. Carter the justice to add that she refuses to take up the cudgels for her fellow-mummers; it suffices for her, apparently, that she herself is without blame. Rightly, I think, she tells us that she has never looked on life with meticulous eyes. Her prayer, we learn, has ever been that she might "encounter, unawed and unafraid, the loss of ease, of wealth, of friends, of love"; and that this petition has been answered all the world had proof when the creator of Du Barry watched with stoic calm the sale by public auction of silk stockings and diamond garters and Parisian lingerie, possessions that are seldom accumulated in quantities by women who look upon the world with meticulous eyes. Whether it was before or after the aforesaid auction—to which of course Mrs. Carter makes no reference in the article before me—I do not know, for she does not specify, but we have it from her pen that a great light broke upon her life when she took unto herself the words the dying Sir Walter Scott addressed to Lockhart—"Be a good man, my dear." In that injunction, Mrs. Carter has found, "lies the one real key to a happy and a useful life." And this truth it has been Mrs. Carter's life-work to inculcate. I know this because she says so herself.

The De-Belascoized Carter

It was a sudden intention, we learn, which sent Mrs. Carter to a stage career. Once on the stage she discovered that work was "the crown of life" and she confesses that she wore her crown modestly through "two years of simply walking through parts." Then came Katy Graydon in "The Ugly Duckling" and a failure in "Miss Helyett." After that she retired for two years and closeted herself with Shakespeare, Moliere, Racine, Corneille, Sheridan, Congreve and Goldsmith. She returned in "The Heart of Maryland," a play which, she confesses, "lacked subtlety." Here Belasco might fittingly be mentioned, but Mrs. Carter is silent, a recent feud having blotted him out of her life and apparently destroyed whatever significance may have attached to his influence. What Mrs. Carter says about Du Barry, Camille and Zaza is, to put it bluntly, piffle and I have no patience to repeat it. Imagine her trying to hold the position that she only played these parts to teach her audiences that "true happiness in life is to be measured always by goodness." Nor have I much sympathy with her declaration that she would gladly lose another $70,000 on a failure like "Kassa" for the pure joy "or giving a beautiful thing to the world." If Mrs. Carter had taken her pen in hand with the sincere purpose of telling what her stage career has meant to her, she would have set down the fact that its chief meaning had been impressed upon her by the outside influence of Belasco who taught her all the stage-craft she has ever known. But that sort of high-minded humility is beyond Mrs. Carter, steeped as she is in an egotism that makes her prate of "doing good," of "moral courage" and of other canting phrases that would be sickening if they were not so very funny.

He Talked to the Chairs

The prominent business men who attended a recent banquet were surprised when one of their number who had never been suspected of eloquence arose and made a graceful, witty and polished after dinner talk. This particular man had been called on quite unexpectedly, so far as most of the banqueters knew, and his sudden metamorphosis into a finished speaker took their breath away. But the secret leaked out before the night was over. A businessman who lives near the orator told how for several evenings past he had seen him ranging the chairs about the deep dining room window of his beautiful home and addressing them with solemn mien and copious gesticulation. Had the orator taken the precaution to draw the curtains the secret of his newly acquired eloquence might never have been betrayed.

Mighels on Married Misery

So many instances have been recorded where authors have transferred their own infelicities to the pages of their stories that perhaps we are inclined to attach too much meaning to fancied resemblances between novels and the actual experience of those who have written them. I do not presume to pass judgment in this particular on the latest novel of Philip Verrill Mighels whose domestic differences with his talented wife have recently been exploited at length in the local papers; but for the benefit of those who delight to trace these usually far-fetched likenesses I call attention to the plot of "The Pillars of Eden," as the new book is called. Outrageously tricked, Adam Croswell loses the woman whom he loved and who loved him. In the course of time he marries, but finds his wife determined to pass her days in a luxurious idleness in which she cultivates imaginary ills. Mighels draws a vivid picture of the seifishness of such a woman and of the dangers to which she exposes her husband by her lack of interest in anything but herself. In fact his novel almost becomes a tract as he castigates the wife who is not a helpmate but merely the wearer of a man's name and the distributor of his money. "There ought to be something higher, more unselfish and helpful in a woman's scheme of married life than an endless appetite for the seaside, the opera, gowns, bridge, dogs and money-spending," declares the hero out of the bitterness of his experience when asked for matrimonial advice. "The functions of her married life should comprehend at least a little of helpfulness, work-sharing, wifehood and motherhood. Otherwise it's all a ghastly farce and a prodding of the man to his ruin. I'm not advising any young man. I'm simply telling you what you may expect if you link your life with that of a woman who will make of you another American machine instead of the head of the house—some woman reared to think of nothing but herself." All of which of course is absolutely unsuggestive of the the matrimonial infelicity which has won for Mrs. Mighels the sympathy of all who know her.

Scheffauer Writes For the Cornhill

Hermann Scheffauer, the brilliant young San Franciscan poet and essayist, has scaled the most difficult heights of London journalism for he has had an article published in the October number of the Cornhill magazine. The Cornhill was Thackeray's favorite magazine and many of his best works, such as the Roundabout Papers, first appeared there. The Cornhill was also the magazine in which most of Stevenson's essays were first published. It has never lowered its flag to sensationalism but maintains unsullied its rare reputation for clean fiction, lively travels and essays of high literary flavor. Scheffauer invades this exclusive close of journalism with a brief but charming essay on old Jules Simoneau, the restaurateur of Monterey who was the warm friend of Robert Louis Stevenson, and our most exacting apostles of culture will find nothing to carp at in his contribution. It is worthy of Thackeray's and Stevenson's magazine.

The Political Situation

Although the wiseacres have already forecast the outcome of the municipal campaign it seems to me that it would require a more astute observer of political signs than has yet been discovered in our midst to tell us with some show of reason who is to be the next mayor of San Francisco. Interest in the current contest was dashed first by the visit which President Taft paid to this city and attention has been further distracted by the Portola celebration. Your ordinary citizen has not room in his brain for more than a few things at a time and it looks as though the mayoralty issue will be decided in the closing week of the fight which is not, after all, such a very unusual situation. To the man who circulates with the crowds downtown it would seem that P. H. McCarthy has all the best of the political controversy so far. There are more prophets hailing his approaching triumph than any other, but the experienced politican does not attach too much importance to this sort of soothsaying. The truth is that even the practical politicians are "up in the air" and, to change the figure of speech, are gluing their ears to the ground with painful persistency. It is much easier, at the present time, as one of these politicians remarked to me the other day, to prove that none of the three candidates can possibly be elected than to show how any of them is to win. The registration, of course, is overwhelmingly republican, but this has been the case election after election without helping to place a republican candidate in the mayor's chair.

The Impoverished Republicans

The men who are trying to elect William Crocker are not too hopeful of the event. They have encountered disheartening difficulties in the collection of an adequate campaign fund. They have been turned down in high places whence copious financial assistance was wont to flow; men who, however small their contributions might be, could generally be depended on for financial and moral support, have shown the cold shoulder to their most insistent pleadings. Probably the severest blow came from I. W. Hellman Jr. The banker who did more than anybody else to make Crocker the choice of the business men's committee absolutely refused to give a cent, vouchsafing as his reason the undesirability of a financier of his position backing a loser. When Mose Gunst wrote the Republican finance committee a check for fifty dollars great joy pervaded the camp, a plain indication of the parlous times which have come upon the republican party. It cannot be said that Crocker is making the headway on the stump which his warmest admirer might desire. Without experience in political speaking he has failed so far to learn the art of tickling the voter's ear and cementing the friendship of the mob. When Crocker, speaking to union labor men, says: "Boys—I want to call you boys because I am one of you, just plain Bill Crocker," he is very far from making the impression he intends. The laboring man is as quick as any other to see through that sort of buncombe; he much prefers the hectoring methods of McCarthy who certainly has learned deftness in the manipulation of the sympathies of his audiences. I do not think that Crocker's reiterated assertion that he is not running for mayor for the money there may be in the job is a vote-clincher either. The voters have their minds fixed on other things than the salary and perquisites of the Mayor's office. It is probable that, in the absence of the funds with which to purchase banners and other forms of advertising, Crocker will have to rest his hope of election largely upon the systematic house-to-house canvassing which is being done for him in all parts of the city and that at best is a precarious support.

The Democratic Outlook

As between Crocker and Dr. Leland it certainly looks as though the Coroner is out of the running. His friends insist that he has the advantage of position, having two places on the ballot, but experience teaches that a preponderance of nominations is not of much consequence. Strong efforts are being made to persuade voters that to defeat McCarthy they must vote for Leland, but at the same time Crocker's supporters are maintaining that unless the conservative element gets in behind the planing mill man the Labor candidate will surely be elected. These tactics are certainly advantageous to McCarthy, as they tend to an even split of the vote against him. McCarthy is in much the same position as Schmitz was when the Republicans were asserting that Lane had no chance and the Democrats were insisting upon the weakness of Crocker.

Mulcrevy Sure of Election

While politicians are speculating on the outcome of the contests for various offices, there is a unanimity of opinion respecting the moral certainty of Harry Mulcrevy's re-election to the county clerkship. Mulcrevy has made a competent public officer; even his political antagonists are forced to concede that; and his administration has received the indorsement of the bench and bar, an unusual compliment, for these gentlemen are generally exacting and carping critics of the servants of the public. That they have had no fault to find with our county clerk is surely high testimony to his fitness and from the conversation of a number of my friends both judicial and legal, I gather that there is a genuine feeling in favor of keeping him where he has served so well.

Great Sea Fighter Passes Away

The recent death in Brookline, Massachusetts, of Read-Admiral Charles J. Barclay, retired, a sailor whose experience started in the great rebellion and lasted through the Spanish-American war, recalls to mind the capture of the confederate steamer Florida in which he had a part. When Barclay left Annapolis he was assigned to the Wachusett, a sloop of war under commander Napoleon Collins and part of the Brazilian squadron. The Florida was the first of the commerce destroyers of English origin. After running the blockade out of Mobile harbor in 1862, she cruised around for a long time and finally put into Bahia, in Brazil, in 1864. The commander of the Florida found the Wachusett in port, but he took a position about half a mile from the United States warship. A Brazilian corvette, as a precaution, took a berth between the two vessels. The temptation to violate the neutrality of the port of Bahia was too great for Commander Collins, and he resolved to run down the Florida and sink her at her anchorage. It was his design to give the act the appearance of an accident, but the plan was so badly carried out that the capture of the Florida assumed the character of a perfectly unjustifiable outrage. Before daylight the Wachusett got under way, passed the Brazilian corvette, and ran into the Florida, striking her on the starboard quarter, cutting down her bulwarks and carrying away her mizzenmasts. Commander Collins fired one or two volleys and the Florida surrendered. At the time of the capture the captain and a large part of the crew of the Florida were ashore; the remainder were taken prisoners. The Florida was taken to Hampton Roads. While negotiations for the return of the vessel were in progress she was run into by a transport and sunk. The capture of the Florida was a deliberate violation of the rights of neutrals. Brazil having complained that her neutrality had been violated, Secretary Seward disavowed the act of Commander Collins. But the action of the commander of the Wachusett met with the approval and satisfaction of the country at large, in spite of the official declarations. Commander Collins was tried by court-martial, but he was not long under technical punishment for the affair. The Florida had had an active time of it, for during her short career she had captured thirty-seven merchantmen.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy.

Stocks: The sharp recovery in stocks at the close of this week has shown distinctly that the recent break in values was largely engineered by certain powerful market interests here who were in touch with the European situation on money and were prepared for the rise in the foreign bank rates. The break might be termed a bear coup worked by market manipulators. The fact is that leading bankers here are not anticipating any money stringency this fall and look to see a rate of about five per cent maintained over January first. However it seems patent that any speculation by the public will be promptly checked by an advance in call money. There seems very little to say about the news of the recent week. Reports in some industrial centers show increased business and railways expect record earnings in the coming six months. Hence it is plausible to anticipate great stability in securities with a rising tendency for the long pull.

Grain: High premium for wheat in the cash markets has lifted the futures, and along with the six cents advance the past week, the cash premiums advanced eight cents for hard and spring grades, still leaving the futures below the actual present values. This condition has alarmed the milling trade, and heavy purchases from store have been made the past three days. It is a market that has developed against professional and experienced operators. The big buyers have been houses in touch with the consuming trade, and the leaders have taken everything offered without abating their bidding. Until the volume of wheat from the farms becomes larger than in the past month, there will be little comfort for the bear. Some traders are figuring on a December condition similar to that of September. While it is early to look that far ahead, it has a repressive effect upon the speculator. In other years the speculator at the large markets basing his judgment upon the crop and the supply outlook has made the prices. For the second successive year the farmers have withheld selling at market prices and forced the cash operators to pay higher prices. It is a feature of the grain trade that must be reckoned with in the future. The result of this condition has been to remove all hedges and the market is entirely speculative with no actual grain being sold for future delivery, a situation that makes bull operations very successful. Until the markets are at a hedging price we cannot advise short selling.

Corn: The situation is working along the same lines as wheat. The country grain dealers were short on the theory of prices declining with the new crop coming to the market. The government report was for a smaller crop than the trade expected. There has not been an eager acceptance of bids. On the other hand the consumer is buying from hand to mouth. The southwest is short of feed stuff; the cotton belt will have less cotton seed meal and cake for feeding. The outlook is for a big demand for corn and all coarse feed. Until there is a heavy movement of corn the long side is preferable as the probability favors a slow marketing by the three big surplus States, and a repetition of the wheat action.

Cotton: Men no longer sell cotton short merely because they can obtain more than 13 cents for such contracts. The magnitude of the world's requirement encountering a limited yield and a concessionless attitude among spot owners has rendered short selling at current values unattractive, to say the least, since the height of the marketing season has brought to light no distressed cotton, no forced selling and no encouragement to price recessionists. Under such conditions, the true incentive behind a short time policy among the mills is to be found, first, in the necessity for lifting yarn values to a parity with the cost of the raw material, and, next, as a means by which consumption may be brought within the range of supply. This week the spinner north and south will divide interest with the threatened frost invasion. Word from Charlotte, N. C., is to the effect that 12,000,000 spindles had been pledged to the cause of short time. Advices during the week by way of Boston pointed out that the support of only 7,000,000 spindles was looked for. You can close a mill down on paper without much trouble. As to actual curtailment, and its nearness at this critical time, the newspapers of Lowell and other New England cities, take issue with Fall River and Providence, declaring that the outlook does not warrant such talk. So long as consumers are willing buyers at current values talk of short time for the purpose of beating down the cost of actual cotton is meaningless. The crop has been moved to tidewater so fast that on the basis of a crop of 11,500,000, and many do not believe it will be over 11,000,000, there would be only 9,500,000 bales more to the market balance of this season compared with 12,032,000 bales balance of one year ago, and herein lies the strength of the situation. We expect the movement to show a falling off from now on and a steadily advancing market for the next three months.

Local Securities: The California security list continues in a very healthy tone and business, while not so large as formerly, is still above the average and bids fair to increase at any time. It is a noticeable feature that the trading in the local list is gradually becoming broader and instead of the heavy dealings being confined to two or three stocks, many others are fast gaining in popularity. This may be especially applied to Spring Valley Water, Alaska Packers and Associated Oil. The first stock has had some excellent buying and it is said that an increase in the water company's dividend will be announced before the first of the year. Alaska Packers is rapidly getting into grand shape, financially, and I learn from a good source, that the association's earnings will be close to a million dollars this season. The fact that the Associated Oil Company closed a contract with the Japanese government to supply the latter with 200,000 barrels of crude oil every month has caused the buying and the advance in this stock. I hear that the oil company will shortly issue $25,000,000 in 5 per cent bonds to defray the expenses of installing new pipe line connections in order to be able to deliver the oil required on this contract with Japan. Pacific Telephone stocks have been rather dull with a tendency to decline. The New York market has as formerly led us in this movement. Pacific Gas and Electric stocks after remaining quiet but firm for a week or two, have lately reawakened and advanced with New York buying orders again causing the advance. Hawaiian sugar stocks show signs of becoming active again, though it will probably be near December before they make their usual move. Bond trade has continued large with the issues of Southern California railway and power companies continuing the strongest spot on the list. The quotations of most of our home bonds have remained practically unchanged. For the immediate future, I feel that purchases of Pacific Gas and Electric stocks and Pacific Telephone preferred will prove the most profitable and I think that Alaska Packers is an excellent buy for a longer pull. The above mentioned news on Associated Oil should have a strengthening effect, though I would advise that caution be used in dealing in it. It is my idea that Telephone common is high enough at present and I think that as the ginger has sort of gone out of its movements, it will have a further setback, at least to 50.

A GAMBLER'S SUPERSTITION

I was watching a game of poker once, at Helena, Mont. The players were a gambler (whom I knew slightly and who bore the sobriquet of "Lucky Bill") and two miners. Suddenly, after the hands were dealt and the players had "chipped in" and drawn cards, Lucky Bill, with perfect calmness and not so much as a shadow of a change in the expression of his face, laid his cards on the table, took a note-book from his pocket and deliberately wrote a few words. Then he tore out the leaf and handed it to me. "Look at that when you get home tonight." His voice was steady and did not betray a particle of excitement. I thrust the paper aimlessly into my pocket and gave the matter hardly a second thought. The play progressed. Luck Bill's face was unyielding as a stone and entirely inexpressive. He noticed everything, however, and his vigilant eye did not miss the slightest move on the part of the other players. He was a typical gambler and one of the most successful of his guild. Hence his sobriquet. At last there was an altercation between the two miners. Hot words ensued and revolvers were drawn. Some of the bystanders interfered at this point and, in the scuffle that followed, I heard the sharp whistle and sping of a bullet. Lucky Bill (his good star in the descendent) fell to the floor and expired without a groan. He had been killed by the accidental discharge of a pistol in the hands of one of the miners. I was horrified at the occurrence and that evening after I reached home, I thought of the line the gambler had written me. I took it from my pocket and read: "I have drawn a pair of sevens. I now hold a jack full on red sevens. It is a fatal hand. No one ever yet held it and left the card table alive. I shall die. I have $6,000 in the First National of Bismarck. Notify my mother, Mrs ————, of Franklin, Ky."

For a companion on a joy ride a grand piano is somewhat unique but late Oakland pedestrians along Telegraph avenue were greeted by this sight, when a Thomas Flyer loaded with a large concert piano and fourteen students took its way up the college campus, where the trophy was safely deposited on North Hall steps. The instrument formerly occupied a conspicuous place in one of the Oakland cafes which is popular among the boys and was sold for ten cents and an agreement to remove it from the place at once. Failing to secure a flat car, the Thomas Flyer was suggested as the best means of transportation, and a telephone call soon had one of the big cars in front of the place. It was the work of but a few moments for the husky students to amputate the legs and place the piano in the tonneau of the machine. This would seem to have been load enough, but fourteen of the students piled into the car. Out Telegraph avenue, the strang outfit proceeded at a pace which exceded all speed limits, and up the hill to North Hall steps where the prize was carefully unloaded. An examination of the machine disclosed the fact that the tremendous load had inflicted no damage whatever.

Joe Rosborough's Romance

I don't think that even his most intimate friends have yet been entrusted by Joe Rosborough with the details of a pretty romance which may or may not result in the metamorphosis of that popular young bachelor into a Benedick. Although the secret has been closely guarded it has come to me from a most unexpected source and I think it is too interesting to withhold. The young lady in question is a very beautiful and cultured girl who lives not far from Chicago and with whom Mr. Rosborough became acquainted in the easy familiarity of a pullman speeding between the windy city and New York. She was on her way to the metropolis to complete her musical education and Mr. Rosborough whose musical talents are well known, suggested several men and women of great musical ability whom it would be worth her while to meet. The young lady found his advice of great value and wrote from New York to thank him for his kindly assistance. One letter lead to a correspondence and correspondence developed certain romantic feelings which will creep in when two sympathetic pens are keeping two sympathetic hearts in communion. I am told that the only serious obstacle to the union is a difference in religious beliefs for Mr. Rosborough is a devout Roman Catholic while the young lady is a strict Methodist. And in order that I may give you a clue to this romance I may as well tell you that the young lady has recently been visiting in this city.

Bessie Ames is in Business

Miss Bessie Ames is the latest society belle to develop the commercial instinct; that she is generously endowed with the artistic instinct everybody knows. She is one of the best amateur musicians in the smart set; indeed her skill as a cello-player is not equalled by many professionals. Two years ago with her friend Mrs. Benjamin Lathrop, Miss Ames gave a series of chamber concerts in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore that won lavish praise for both these talented Californiennes. But a business career seems to have had greater charms for Miss Bessie than the concert stage and she has for a year past conducted a tea-room in Baltimore. Her associate is one of the clever girls of Baltimore's smart set, and their tea-room is a popular gathering-place for a five o'clock cup. So successful has Miss Ames been in her enterprise that her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Pelham Ames, have gone east to make their home with her. Two of the Ames girls are married and live in Boston and Worthington Ames is the only one of the family who continues to make his home here. Another California girl to go into the "tea-room" business is Miss Anne Field, the sister of Mrs. Arthur Luck who has a "five o'clock" resort in Denver where the smart set daily gathers. Miss Field's tea-room is "set" in the drawing-room of an old mansion which has been most attractively arranged and furnished. It is a pleasure to record the success of both these enterprising San Francisco maids.

Lathrop's voice is of remarkable power and range, but her training has been exclusively for concert work and for that reason she was forced to defer a debut at the Metropolitan. After a consultation with the impresario, Mrs. Lathrop sailed for Paris and is at present studying dramatic art and grand opera roles under one of the famous French masters. She spends much time with her friend Miss Lily Lawlor who makes her home in Paris where she is well known as a drawing-room singer. Mrs. Lathrop has temperament and brains as well as talent and I predict a notable success for her.

Gertrude Atherton and Miss Fay

I met Mrs. Atherton the other day, and with consternation in her voice and countenance she asked me to deny the rumor that Miss Maude Fay is the heroine of her forthcoming novel. Of course I could not delve too curiously for the reason of this eagerness to exonerate Miss Fay from the suspicion of having inspired a fictional effort, novelists having a well-founded distaste for the premature discussion of their books. I infer however that Mrs. Atherton's singer is dowered with a past and if my surmise is correct, it is little wonder that the brilliant writer should wish to dissociate Miss Fay's name from the gossip concerning the book. By the way, Mrs. Atherton's reception for Miss Fay at the Fairmont was the most brilliant function given here in honor of the beautiful young singer. The pick of the various sets were there. Even Mrs. Gordon Blanding who rarely graces such occasions, went to meet Miss Fay. Mrs. Edward Eyre assisted her sister-in-law, Mrs. Atherton, in receiving.

Miss Fay Sang in Muir Woods

There has been a great deal of disappointment among Miss Fay's friends because they have had no opportunity to hear her voice. But I hear that she gave one public recital the other day which was thoroughly appreciated by all who happened to be enjoying the verdant boskage of Muir Woods. The Fays picnicked there recently and while the party was strolling among the trees, Miss Fay picked up a great limb of a tree and holding it like a spear, uttered that tremendous Cry of the Valkyries. I am told the woods echoed with the volume of sweet sound. It was indeed an appropriate setting for that splendid music. Miss Fay will dedicate the New Theatre in New York on November 3. Walter Damrosch's orchestra of one hundred artists will accompany her when she sings Elizabeth's beautiful aria from Tannhauser.

A Millionaire's Difficult Drink

One of our gilded youths who himself cultivates every fashionable folly with an assiduity worthy a better cause, told me this story the other day: The Shasta Limited was tearing its way through Oregon at a speed which suggested that the thirsty locomotive panted to get out of a state where local option reigns supreme. In the buffet car the steward drooped with the lassitude of idleness and the Californians homeward bound smoked savagely, cursing the prohibition wave for its conquest of Oregon. In the corner of the car, at the writing desk, sat one of our Burlingame millionaires whose escapades have usually been prompted by alcoholic stimulation and whose marital affairs just now come in for a superbundant share of gossipy attention. That he was extremely unhappy anybody could tell from the nervous manner in which he puffed cigarette after cigarette and turned the pages of Rex Beach's "Silver Horde." And to the gilded youth who is my authority for this, it seemed quite plausible that the thought uppermost in the millionaire's mind was that celebrated sentiment uttered by the governor of North Carolina to the governor of South Carolina. Finally the miserable millionaire yelled for the porter and that functionary glided forward to take his order. "A pint of Shasta!" The inoffensive beverage was brought and a glassful poured at his elbow, but the millionaire continued to smoke and turn the pages of the book. After a little while he peered around and as nobody seemed to be regarding him, produced from his hip pocket a mysterious little package. Divested of its wrappings it proved to be a bromo seltzer bottle and again glancing about to make sure that he was not being watched, the millionaire emptied its contents into the glass of mineral water. To the sensitive nostrils of my gilded young friend who was taking in the whole performance over the top of a newspaper, came the delicious aroma, not of bromo seltzer, for that has no delicious aroma, but of prime bourbon. To such expedients even millionaires are reduced by the tyranny of local option.

Gum Modelling—The Newest Inanity

Sometimes I wonder whether the education of a society girl necessarily implies the complete loss of dignity and although I admit that this sort of pondering comes to me only in my most pessimistic moods, I must confess that there is only too much evidence to warrant some such conclusion. Society of course is full of charming girls, cultured and sweetly dignified, but alas, there are too many others who seem to know no line between good taste and vulgarity. I am not going to lecture, but it certainly seems to me that some sort of rebuke should be administered to the young ladies who conceived and carried out the gum chewing entertainment which was exploited in the papers the other day as the principal attraction of a dinner over at Ross. I will mention no names, for after all, personalities are unimportant in a matter of this sort; it is purely a question of taste. I do not think that any of the young people present at that dinner would allow themselves to be seen chewing gum in public; in fact I think that they would look down with scorn upon the hardworking factory girl who displayed the habit in their presence. And yet when their hostess, after dinner, handed each of them two packages of gum, with instructions to chew it all at once and then compete in modelling pigs out of the sticky nasty mess, nobody demurred. It was voted great fun and no doubt the prize-winners were quite proud of their cleverness. Now candidly, is this the sort of diversion of which young men and women can afford to be unashamed? Is it not rather the sort of play that would be rebuked in the nursery? To my old-fashioned notions it is a sad commentary on the intelligence of the young folks who took part in this gum chewing contest that they should be pleased with so vulgar and so inane a pastime and when next I meet any of them I am going to tell them so.

Why Men Fight Shy of Society

Now I do not pose as an arbiter elegantiarum, and I have no divine call like Chrysostom of old to scourge the follies of the elect, but this spectacle of youthful members of our exclusive families wagging their jaws over great wads of chewing gum affects me very disagreeably. May we not find in such diversions as this the explanation of the lack of men at social affairs concerning which there is a perennial wail from the leaders of the various sets? Is a man of good intelligence and healthy interests going to frequent houses where he may be asked to mold chewing gum into the graceful lines of the pig? I use this incident as an illustration only; the participants were young and much may be forgiven youth; but it cannot be denied that local society has long been indulged in bizarre incidents of this sort, among which the grewsome appendicitis dinner stands out in memory. Hostesses have responsibilities just as weighty as those which rest upon their guests and they cannot be too careful about the character of the diversions which they inaugurate. Let them blame themselves if eligible young men prefer the festive highball and the giddy lights of the automobile route to the society of young ladies with pig-modelling proclivities. There was no dearth of men at the recent dinner given by the clever Spinners' Club and the reason is not far to seek; the Spinners are women of brilliant attainments who are seriously endeavoring to make the world a little better for their presence and consequently the right sort of men will go out of their way to enjoy their society.

The Carolan Gondoliers

Among the several good stories being told as an aftermath of the elaborate dinner given recently by Mrs. Francis Carolan at her recently acquired country home "Beaulieu" near San Jose, is the "tale of the gondoliers." The dinner was an outdoor affair and all the details had been arranged to make it an event in the social annals of California. An Italian setting was decided upon as being the most spectacular and MacKenzie Gordon, Charley Dickman and others were invited to be part of the local color. For a consideration they consented to pose in a gondola in the pretty little artificial lake, and sing the love songs of the sunny south. The consideration was rather a handsome one; in fact, to be perfectly accurate, each gondolier had a check for a hundred dollars signed by the mistress of the mansion tucked away in his bright hued tunic when he stepped jauntily aboard the tiny craft. The only thing lacking and perforce the only thing not attainable even with Carolan money, was the correct variety of weather. It poured torrents upon the hapless Italian cavaliers who with their water logged guitars strove to live up to the parts for which they had contracted. It was a painful ordeal and only expurgated editions of their conversation afterward would be permissible in polite society.

Filmy Treasures Stolen

Gossip in the fashionable apartment houses of Los Angeles, writes a friend in the southern city, was given unusual zest last week by the theft of a large assortment of expensive lingerie from the apartments of the wife of a well-known mining man of Randsburg. The filmy things had just been brought over from Paris by the unlucky owner, who immediately took to her bed upon the discovery of her loss. Several pieces of handsome lace were also included in the loot of the pilferer. Surrounded by doctor, nurse and detectives the fair matron described the articles that are missing and the fact that most of the things taken are of a single size and cut supplied the only clue and a rather hopeless one at that. One of the choicest and sheerest pieces of muslin that disappeared was a rarely fine robe de nuit from the capital of the world, bearing upon its bosom a beautifully embroidered stork, cherub and other emblems of a happy event portending. So far no progress has been made in the hunt for the person with a fancy for fine things from alien wardrobes.

Lieutenant Shean's Desertion

Friends in this city were shocked to read of the elopement of Lieutenant Daniel Shean and his wife's trained nurse from Fort Crook, Nebraska. Mrs. Shean was formerly Ursula Stone, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Stone, the sister of Mrs. Alexander Fraser Douglas, and the cousin of Miss Helen Baker. A brother, Charles B. Stone Jr., is an army officer. Lientenant and Mrs. Shean have two little children and the devotion of this young couple was often remarked upon. Mrs. Shean as Miss Stone was one of the most attractive and popular young girls in the ultra smart set here. Late letters to friends in this city teemed with glowing accounts of her happy married life and her recovery from a recent illness. She seemed charmed with her husband's new station and it almost seems incredible that he should have abandoned her.

Lady Kesketh Was Annoyed

The wedding of Miss Florence Breckenridge to Thomas Hesketh about which the bavardes have written so much of late reminds me, rather bromidically perhaps, that time works many changes. I remember very well that when Sir Thomas Hesketh married Flora Sharon, Mrs. Breckenridge, alone among the friends of the newly wedded couple, persisted in calling her Mrs. Hesketh. This happened several times one day at a reception, to the amusement of most of the guests but to the visible annoyance of Lady Hesketh, for the little bride was pardonably proud of her new name. And now Mrs. Breckenridge is Mrs. Fred Sharon, the sister-in-law of Lady Hesketh and Florence Breckenridge has become Mrs. Thomas Hesketh. By the way, letters received here indicate the brilliancy of the ceremony in the British embassy chapel in Paris in a manner not conveyed by the press dispatches. They also bring the news that Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Sharon expect to return to California in November.

The Palace Opening

Although the opening of the new Palace is over a month distant, invitations are already in the mails and the most elaborate preparations are under way. Everybody who is anybody in central California is planning to have a share in the frolic. Instead of having a tedious fatiguing banquet, as first planned, the intention now is to permit the friends of the hotel to enjoy themselves after their own fashion and scores of dinner parties are to be given that night. Reservations for the entertainment of 1,500 have been made, exhausting the seating capacity of the three dining halls, the ball room and the concert room. Among some of the largest dinners to be given will be those presided over by Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Sharon, Mr. and Mrs. George Almer Newhall, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph B. Coryell, Mr. and Mrs. M. H. De Young, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Henshaw, Mr. and Mrs. Wickham Havens, Mr. and Mrs. William Fries, Mr. and Mrs. Wellington Gregg, Mr. and Mrs. F. C. Havens, John Lawson, Senator and Mrs. Francis Newlands of Nevada, Mr. and Mrs. I. W. Hellman, Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Peixotto, Mr. and Mrs. Gerald Rathbone, Mr. and Mrs. Baldwin Wood, Dr. Harry Tevis, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Welch, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Sloss, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Chanslor and Mrs. Phoebe Hearst.

The Wanamaker Wedding in Paris

Letters received within the last few days from San Franciscans sojourning in Paris have much to say about the recent marriage of Miss Fernanda Wanamaker, granddaughter of John Wanamaker, and Arturo de Heeren, a Spanish grandee who lives in Paris and Biarritz. Aside from the splendor of the marriage and the beautiful gowns which were in evidence, matters over which the San Franciscans present at the affair wax very enthusiastic, the most interesting feature of the marriage was the fact that three ceremonies were performed. The bridegroom being a Roman Catholic the first ceremony was performed at the church of Saint Philippe du Roule; then followed a Protestant ceremony and finally there was the civil contract at the mairie. Ambassador White who was one of the witnesses said after the wedding that he was pleased to attend the Catholic ceremony because the Vatican, in contradiction to what had occurred at the time of his daughter's marriage, had agreed to the Protestant ceremony. The ambassador added that he had determined never to attend an American wedding where his countryman's religion, whatever it might be, was ignored. It will be recalled that when Mr. White's daughter Muriel was married last April to Count Scherr-Thosa at St. Joseph's Roman Catholic Church the ambassador refused to attend the ceremony because Cardinal Kopp, the Bishop of Breslau, refused to grant a dispensation for the mixed marriage except on condition that the bridegroom refrain from attending any other religious ceremony. Mr. White gave his consent to the wedding, but as a protest against the action of the church authorities refused to attend the services.

The Williams' Ball

Everybody is glad that Mrs. Henry Williams has decided to entertain again this winter, for a more hospitable home than the old Williams place at the top of Octavia street, near Sacramento, it would be hard to find any where. Mrs. Williams belongs to the ancient regime, having come to San Francisco with the first exodus from the south at the time of the slavery agitation. They brought with them the grand manners of the south and considerable wealth and ruled over society long before the parents of the present social dynasty discovered their gold in the Nevada hills or made it in other ways less romantic. Mrs. Williams gave the first ball of the present season in honor of her three grand-daughters, the daughters of the Harry Alston Williams of Berkeley. It was first intended as a coming-out party for Miss Florence, the oldest daughter, and the friends of the other two girls, Miss Muriel and Miss Corona, were of course also included in the festivity. Then Miss Florence who is a pretty girl with a mind of her own, announced that she preferred continuing her art studies while the two younger girls, both of the typical bud type, decided to remain at school. But their grandmother who is one of the gracious lovable women of the old school, wanted the girls to have their frolic just the same. And what is more, she promises to give two or possibly three other balls this winter, one of them a fancy dress affair, and the younger set is cooing with joy at the prospect. Miss Florence Williams was a picture the night of the ball, in a Parisian gown of dull white satin covered with chiffon and over this a filmy lace dress all covered with tiny crystals. She received such loads of flowers that it was difficult to choose and she changed flowers several times during the evening. Miss Muriel and Miss Corona, their flowerlike faces aglow with delight over their first ball, wore the daintiest of pink chiffon frocks, made bouffant in the flowing princess style which seems so popular this winter. All the debutantes of last winter and the belles of the season before were there, doing their utmost to make Miss Williams' first ball the tiptop success it turned out to be.

Plotner, the talented miniature artist who was awarded the "Grand Prix" at the Seattle exposition for her miniature paintings. When it is remembered that she competed with artists from France as well as from all parts of the United States, her achievement appears a very enviable one. Mrs. Plotner is the youngest daughter of the late Major William B. Hooper and granddaughter of the late Judge Selden S. Wright. As a very young girl she began to study with Miss Evelyn Withrow, afterwards going abroad where she studied under the celebrated Herr Otto Eckhardt of Dresden. It was a keen disappointment to Herr Eckhardt when she declined to remain in Dresden and work with him in his studio. Later she went to Paris where she studied with Madame De Billement. Among the promient people here whom Mrs. Plotner has painted are Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Mrs. Henry T. Scott, Mrs. Joseph S. Tobin, Mrs. Amy Talbot, Mrs. William Breeze and Mrs. Norwood. As soon as the miniatures now in Seattle have been returned to Mrs. Plotner she will give a large tea at her studio, 1515 Bush street and exhibit them to her friends.

In the Social Spotlight

Judge William Hunt of Montana, the former Governor-General of Cuba, is stopping at the Hotel Knickerbocker. He is a brother of the late Randall Hunt and the uncle of the Misses Natalie and Floride Hunt of this city.

Mr. and Mrs. George McNear have taken one of the Kellogg apartments in Taylor street between Washington and Jackson. Miss Ernestine McNear is one of the debutantes of the season.

Letters received by relatives in this city announce the birth of a son to Mr. and Mrs. Victor Kohnk of Hamburg. Mrs. Kohnk was formerly Miss Cara Pickens Noble of this city.

Mrs. A. H. Voorhies left during the week for the east. She will visit relatives in Georgia and attend the Confederate tree planting.

Mrs. John Kirchen, wife of John Kirchen, the well known mining man of Tonopah, is in town on a visit to her sister, Mrs. Bronte M. Aikens.

Mrs. Bessie Riddell, formerly Bessie Tilden, daughter of the late Joseph Tilden, who has been making her home with her sister, Mrs. Oliver B. Bidwell, in Baltimore for the past year, has been spending a few weeks here with old friends. She will leave early in November for the east but will return next spring to reside here permanently.

Dr. and Mrs. Carroll Buck, formerly Mrs. Inez Shorb White, will arrive in San Francisco early in December. Mrs. J. De Barth Shorb is slowly recovering from her recent severe illness.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Havens of Oakland will spend the winter in San Francisco. They have engaged apartments at the Palace Hotel.

Famous Suicides

Aristarchus starved himself to death out of weariness of life. Lucretius, the great Latin poet, stabbed himself in a fit of disgust with life. Cassius fell by his own dagger, after the battle of Philippi—the same dagger, it is said, with which he stabbed Caesar. Homer, it is said, hanged himself in extreme old age because, after a long trial, he could not solve the "Fisherman's Puzzle." Saul, the first King of Israel, killed himself rather than be slain by the Philistines. Defeated in battle and his kingdom gone, he had nothing to live for. Like his great guest, Hannibal, Mithridates killed himself by poison to avoid falling into the hands of the Romans. He preferred death to appearance in the triumphal procession of a Roman General. The great Zeno lived a quiet and happy life until the age of 98, when one day he accidentally stumbled and broke his thumb. He interpreted the accident as a summons from earth, and so he forthwith hanged himself.

Cato was the typical Roman suicide. He killed himself with a dagger on the approach of Caesar's forces to Utica, knowing that the cause of liberty was lost, and being unwilling to survive the downfall of his country.

Sardanapalus, the luxurious Oriental monarch, finding himself hard pressed by his enemies, gathered his guards, his wives, concubines and children together, with all his treasures, and set fire to the building, thus thwarting the hope his foes entertained of taking him alive.

Sappho killed herself by jumping from the Lover's Leap, a Leucadian cliff. This leap was often taken by love-sick persons, who believed that if they survived the fall they would be effectually cured of a hopeless passion. Boats were in attendance below to pick up the leapers if they came to the surface of the sea after the plunge. Sappho had a passion for a young man who did not return her love, and leaped from the cliff in order to be cured. Marc Antony gave the world for a woman's love, but he found himself so poorly compensated by the exchange that, in desperation at the approach of Octavius, and being informed that Cleopatra was endeavoring to make terms for herself by surrendering him, he stabbed himself with his dagger. Being revived, he received the message sent by Cleopatra that she desired to see him; he was carried to her place of refuge. Cleopatra and her maids raised him by ropes to the window of the tower where the Queen found her last home; he was lifted in, and died in her arms.

Defeated at Zama, Hannibal fled to the East to avoid falling into the hands of the Romans, and found temporary security in the dominions of Mithridates. He incited this monarch to engage in a Roman war, and his advice as to its conduct being rejected, the war proved unsuccessful, and Mithridates was required, as one of the conditions of peace, to deliver up Hannibal to his enemies, the Romans. The unfortunate Carthaginian heard of his approaching fate, swallowed the poison which for years he had carried about his person, and expired just as the envoys arrived to take him in charge. Suicide was a fitting termination to the career of a monster like Nero. Deserted by every friend and in momentary danger of falling into the hands of his enemies, he could not summon up courage to take his own life. By turns he wept; prayed to the gods and cursed his fate. He begged some of the attendants to die first, in order to teach him fortitude. They respectfully declined. There was a knock on the door of the miserable abode. Soldiers sent by the Senate to arrest him had come. In desperation he seized a dagger and gave himself a slight wound in the throat. But the effect would have been a failure had not his freedmen lent assistance and pushed the dagger into a vital point. He had sufficient strength left on the entry of the soldiers to mutter: "Is this your fidelity?" and immediately expired, even in death his countenance retaining its appalling ferocity.

Maxims and Reflections

(Translated from Goethe)

It is no wonder that we all more or less delight in the mediocre, because it leaves us in peace; it gives us the comfortable feeling of intercourse with what is like ourselves.

Reading ought to mean understanding; writing ought to mean knowing something; believing ought to mean comprehending; when you desire a thing, you will have to take it; when you demand it you will not get it; and when you are experienced you ought to be useful to others.

We should know one another better if one man were not so anxious to put himself on equality with another.

At all times it has not been the age, but individuals alone, who have worked for knowledge. It was the age which put Socrates to death by poison, the age which burnt Huss. The ages have always remained alike.

If I know my relation to myself and the outer world, I call it truth. Every man can have his own peculiar truth; and yet it is always the same.

To live in a great idea means to treat the impossible as though it were possible. It is just the same with a strong character; and when an idea and character meet, things arise which fill the world with wonder for thousands of years.

Kepler said: "My wish is that I may perceive the God whom I find everywhere in the external world, in like manner also within and inside me." The good man was not aware that in that very moment the divine in him stood in the closest connection with the divine in the Universe.

To be and remain true to one's self and others, is to possess the noblest attribute of the greatest talents.

Fernanda Eliscu in "The Third Degree"

It should always be a pleasure for the appraiser of dramatic values to hail the advent of a fine player. Carping at mediocrity is an easy but a very unpleasant task while the adequate appreciation of genius or great brilliancy as displayed on the stage places the critic on his mettle and necessitates the employment of all the knowledge with which experience and study have endowed him. I would like to set down here all the thoughts and feelings with which Fernanda Eliscu inspired me when I witnessed her portrayal of the role of Annie Jeffries in "The Third Degree." There was a great deal of wonderment in my mind. Here was a girl—she cannot be more than twenty-five years of age—who only recently emerged from a little Yiddish playhouse on the East Side of New York. She has been entrusted with an extremely difficult part in a big drama, yet from first to last she is the unfaltering mistress not of her role alone but of the whole play. Perhaps the dramatic instinct grows in Miss Eliscu's nature; of her parentage I know nothing. Perhaps the training of the wonderful Yiddish stage can impart poise and an appearance of maturity which would be regarded as precocious in a young woman trained on the American stage strictly so-called. If my estimate of Miss Eliscu's age is nearly correct she is a good many years short of the ripeness of her art, but it is difficult to imagine any excellencies which she could bring to her portrayal of the role if she were an older woman. This is as near an intimation that Miss Eliscu is perfect in her mastery of her part as one with a dread of superlatives can supply. It may be fanciful to attach too much importance to Miss Eliscu's antecedents, to her ancestry even; but I venture to surmise that this young woman feels the part she plays almost as keenly as she would if fate had cast her for it in the pitiless drama of real human suffering; also I venture to offer what may or may not be an explanation of this. If correct it goes far to explain the naturalness of Miss Eliscu's art. This young actress is not pretty; she has a face that is refreshingly different from the doll baby countenances which so often constitute the young actress' sole claim to stellar distinction. But it is a very mobile face, molded—who knows?—to its plastic lines which so easily change from poignant sorrow to quick but uncertain joy by how many generations of suffering? Miss Eliscu belongs to a persecuted race; she has come out of that congested district of New York which is the modern American counterpart of the ancient Ghetto where, no doubt, her ancestors wore the contumelious yellow in pride and shame. There is a crooked smile that fleets from time to time across her face which seems to me the epitome of sorrow. The tears come easily to eyes that have looked sensitively on pain and if Miss Eliscu has escaped the sadness of life, it is more, I take it, than her ancestors did. This may be fanciful but I do not think so. Physiognomy does not often deceive us when the faces studied are of the kind which have never been allowed to wear the mask of cynical indifference to good and evil. And if it should be fanciful, then is Miss Eliscu a more marvelous actress than I give her credit for being; to me it seems that she brings to her part in "The Third Degree" the pent-up feelings of more years than she will ever live. It is a big part and a long one; it carries the weight of the entire play. Annie Jeffries has been made to stand alone by the author, pitting the strength and weakness of her femininity against the powers of the police, of hard-hearted wealth, of legal tradition and of womanly selfishness and hypocrisy. Miss Eliscu makes Annie Jeffries conquer in a melodramatic conflict without recourse to the melodramatic weapons which were placed within her reach. She wrings the heart-strings of her audience; why should it seem in the least unnatural that she should win her battle for the life and love of her weak boy-husband after the same fashion? It is a deft unobtrusive craft which this actress uses, never once suggesting theatricality in the bad sense of that word. It is so natural that it scarcely conveys the suggestion of intensity; but the illusion is continuous until the last curtain drops. It will be too bad if we are not given an early opportunity to see Miss Eliscu in another part, a part radically different. All my calculations are good for nothing if she be not possessed of versatility. Of the supporting company too much in praise cannot be said; and of the play I think no higher compliment can be passed, seeing that Klein wrote it as an indictment of police methods, than to set down here that a captain of police and an "upper office man" who witnessed it on the opening night seemed much disconcerted at certain turns of scene and dialogue.

Tully Satirizes the Carmelites

"Cupid, the Cow-Punch" is certainly an innocent enough title for a theatrical entertainment but the drama which Dick Tully has fashioned out of the novel of the same name by his gifted wife and which Bishop's players are pioneering at Ye Liberty Playhouse, is loaded with dynamite. The explosion will probably take place the first time one of the litterateurs that dwell in Carmel-By-the-Sea journeys to Oakland to witness the play. It will not be a resounding public explosion, but a perfectly genteel one, a discreet explosion which will set Dick Tully's ears a-tingle and blow him into smithereens of apologetic explanation. It is not until the last act that the dynamite in the drama is revealed but once uncovered there is no mistaking its import. "Cupid, the Cow-Punch" travels in leisurely fashion from the Bar Y ranch in Oklahoma to the shabby purlieus of "chromo-bohemianism" in New York. Arrived there the play becomes the stuff out of which social and literary broils are fashioned. In a room of shaded lights and punk-laden atmosphere the "bohemians" of music and poetry foregather to pose and epigrammatize and drink beer and applaud one another's productions. Tully lays on his colors with a slap-dash hand and the place is redolent of culturine. The climax of the satire comes when a poet, swelling beneath the adoring eyes of the ladies, reads a versicular trifle which is nothing less than a parody of certain lines in "A Wine of Wizardry." This audacious incident is thoroughly enjoyable but what will be George Sterling's greeting to Dick Tully when next they meet in the haunts of the Carmelites? I imagine there will be a very realistic Carmel whirl over the satire. The collective indignation of the colonists who abide in what Mirza Ali Khuli Khan has called the artistic hub of the universe will be lifted to the boiling-point by the inferential ridicule suggested when the brow of the poet who parodies Sterling is wreathed with bays. To accentuate the piquancy of the satire he wears the drooping leaves over his eye-lashes for the rest of the scene and discourses about his inspiration. I am no prophet but it strikes me that Tully has started trouble in Gath. As for the play in toto, it is too long, a fault easily rectified. There is in it an amount of material which David Belasco could mold to fine dramatic lines, as he did with the crude mass of Tully's former effort. Florence Oakley gives a capable interpretation of the heroine while Sidney Ayres is rather too soulful, too moist-eyed a cow-puncher. The honors of the production belong to that capable veteran of the local boards, George P. Webster who made a delightful cowboy and to Robert Lawler who enacted the unctuous role of the poet.

"Becky Sharp" at the Alcazar

For the first time by a stock company anywhere "Becky Sharp" will be presented next Monday evening at the Alcazar. As its title indicates, the play is founded on Thackeray's "Vanity Fair." Langdon Mitchell made the adaptation expressly for Mrs. Fiske who appeared in it ten years ago at the California Theatre, where it ran three weeks at high prices. In the Alcazar production Evelyn Vaughan will have the title role. Other notable portrayals will be that of Rawdon Crawley by Will R.

Walling, the Marquis of Steyne by Louis Bennison, Sir Pitt Crawley by Charles Dow Clark, Pitt Crawley junior by Howard Hickman, Lieutenant Dobbin by William Garwood, George Osborne by Harrison Ford, Joseph Sedley by James Corrigan, Major Loder by George Baldwin, Amelia Osborne by Bessie Barriscale, Miss Crawley by Adele Belgarde, the Marchioness of Steyne by Christie MacLean, Lady Jane by Grace Travers and Briggs by Anne Lockhardt. Sumptuous staging is made admissible by the places (London and Brussels), the period (1815-28) and the people of the play. The ball-room scene made famous by Byron's poem will be the most elaborate and beautiful ever presented in the Alcazar.

Danseuse at the Orpheum

Mlle. Bianci who with her company of terpsichorean artists, heads the Orpheum bill next week is the leading exponent of the classic dance in Europe. This is her first American tour and the patrons of the Orpheum can rely on a rare treat. For her engagement here she has designed four numbers which exhibit her grace, skill and versatility to the greatest advantage. She has named them "The Dresden China Dance," "Egyptian," "La Dance En Volant" and "Satanella." Hal Godfrey and his company will present "A Very Bad Boy" in which they recently appeared at the Tivoli Music Hall, London. Keno, Walsh and Melrose, comedy gymnasts, appear in what they term "The Revolving Arch." "General" Edward La Vine, "the man who has soldiered all his life," has a comedy juggling act. Next week will be the last of Howard and Howard, Martinettie and Sylvester, Ballerini's Canine Tumblers and George Bloomquest in "Nerve."

Musical Comedy at the Garrick

The pace started by "Honeymoon Trail" bids fair to be surpassed at the Garrick by the next offering, the popular "The Time, the Place, and the Girl" which was the Van Ness's musical hit of last year. The company coming this year comprises Elizabeth Goodall who made a hit as the nurse at the Van Ness, Robert Pitkin, a former favorite of the Kolb and Dill forces and Jessie Huston, the soubrette who caused a rumpus lately in Sacramento by accusing a society leader of talking with her over the footlights. The original chorus of show girls and "ponies" is drilled in Ned Weyburn's thorough style. The ten musical numbers include "Thursday is my Jonah Day," "The Waning Honeymoon," "Blow the Smoke Away," "I don't like your family," "Don't you tell," "First and only," "Dixie, I love you," and "Uncle Sam's Best Girl."

The Sousa Concerts

Will L. Greenbaum will open the musical season with eight stunning and novel programs by John Philip Sousa and his incomparable band. The concerts will begin in Dreamland Rink on Thursday, November 4. Greenbaum promises programs replete with masterpieces by such composers as Sibelius, Sinding, Grieg, Friedman and Tschaikowsky and also a novelty in the vocal line—duets sung by Miss Frances Hoyt, soprano, and Miss Grace Hoyt, mezzo-soprano. There will be three new Sousa compositions, one of which is a Bachanalian Suite entitled "People Who Live in Glass Houses" and another a patriotic march called "The Glory of the Yankee Navy." The programs are so full of good things that a booklet containing all of them wil be distributed at the box office which will open Monday, November 1 at Sherman Clay & Co.'s. Mail orders should be addressed to W. L. Greenbaum at that address. At matinees the young folks will be given choice seats for 25 and 50 cents.

Comedy Coming to Van Ness

Charles Klein's "The Third Degree" will be seen at the Van Ness for a second and final week commencing with Sunday night. There will be Wednesday and Saturday matinees. The comedy season at the Van Ness will open Monday night, November 1 with the appearance of "The Traveling Salesman." This is a merry play from the pen of James Forbes, author of "The Chorus Lady" in which Rose Stahl appeared here. Mr. Forbes in his latest effort is said to have shown "life on the road" as successfully as he depicted "life behind the scenes." Seats go on sale Thursday.

Business Drama at Valencia

"The Ringmaster," a drama of intrigue and graft in Wall Street will begin its second and last week at the Valencia Sunday evening, with the usual matinees on Wednesday and Saturday. This first work of Oliver Porter, a young New Yorker, holds the interest by the force of its appeal to the elementary human love of a contest. In it there is quick action, excitement and love enough to satisfy the most ardent devotee of melodramatic entertainment. Eddie Foy, by many considered America's greatest musical comedian, with a company of seventy-five, will appear in "Mr. Hamlet of Broadway" at the Valencia commencing Sunday night, October 31. "There are many stranger things in Heaven and Earth, Horatio, than are dreamed of in your philosophy," said Hamlet to his friend, and Eddie Foy's Hamlet is one of them. It is the strangest Hamlet that the stage has ever seen and that it is the funniest goes without saying.

"Sweet Kitty" at Ye Liberty

Next Monday evening the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will give the playgoers of the cities across the bay their first opportunity of enjoying "Sweet Kitty Bellairs," David Belasco's delightful romance of Old England. Florence Oakley should fit delightfully into the title role. She has the youth, grace and good looks required by the part, and should be fetching in the quaint old costumes. With Sydney Ayres as Lord Verney, George Fried as O'Hara, Henry Shumer as the old Colonel, and Robert Harrison, Laura Hudson, Maude Odell, Mrs. Gleason and the rest of the favorites an excellent cast is assured. Scenically, the play can be present on Ye Liberty's big revolving stage as it could no where else. "Sweet Kitty Bellairs" is announced for one week only, after which comes "Shore Acres."

Fabiola Benefit at Ye Liberty

One of the biggest events of the season in Oakland society circles is promised in the Fabiola Hospital benefit jinks scheduled to take place in Ye Liberty Playhouse, Tuesday evening, November 2. Society on both sides of the bay has taken a keen interest in the entertainment since it will include a number of the features that figured prominently in the fashionable show given at Menlo several weeks ago. Among San Franciscans who will participate will be Miss Kathleen de Young who will repeat her clever song "Do You Know Mr. Schneider?" and her sister, Mrs. Joseph O. Tobin who will give an amusing number from "Dream City" entitled "Tit for Tat." The first part of the program will be the Burmese music-drama, "The Pagoda of Flowers," by Amy Woodforde-Finden. This will be given for the first time in dramatic setting on any stage. The solo parts will be taken by Miss Georgie Cope, who has just returned from abroad and who is directing the production; Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup, Carl Anderson and Lowell Redfield. Paul Steindorff will conduct.

The Original Swain's Bakery and Restaurant announce the opening of their new place at 140 O'Farrell street, opposite the New Orpheum, where the best of service and good things to eat and drink will be found, including Bread, Candies and Ice Cream Sodas of their own make. Open after the Theatre.

New Fabrics and Modes

While it seems to be expected each season that there will be some one pattern or shade especially in vogue and while it often so happens, it is not the case this season. Gray and blue are equally prominent and brown for ultra fashionables is trying hard to come to the front. There is, however, one thing certain, that stripes or stripe effects have been displaced this season with little checks, plaid or plain effects and the stripes shown are not very prominent. They are very appropriate for the heavy or stocky man. Oxford blue and leather shades are shown somewhat. One can also find combinations of light gray with lines of purple, distinct black and white or brown and white Shepherd plaids, or reverse weave or herringbone with finer red overplaid, or brown with overplaid of brown and green. Great favorites also are Harries homespuns, Donegal, Tipperary and a fabric on this order from Nova Scottia.

For the Rainy Season

This season there is really something new to be seen in the Rain Coat Line. The new coat is called the Piccadilly or semi-Yeo coat. In appearance this coat is a Raglan with a low chincollar and weather straps under the cuff bands at the sleeve so that it can be used for auto or driving. This coat can also be used as a duster for it is absolutely dust proof. This coat is taken from the old Yeo (Yeomany) coat which was specialy designed and introduced by the most famous English Raincoat maker to meet the requirement of the horseman generally. Moreover, as a coat for general use, it can be said without a doubt that the Piccadilly has distinction, untility and comfort if compared with any other garment purporting to be of like shape at present before the public.

"Our American cousins," this great English maker says, "have tried to put something like it on the market, but it goes without saying that 83 years of making these lines of coats count for something."

The Piccadilly is essentially a slip on, which by critics is defined as "a great coat thrown loosely over the shoulders like a cloak," but the term slip on has long since signified a coat of its own style with sleeves cut in to the neck of the same material. The material used is a wool mohair on the outside with silkized rubber on the inside.

death of the Emperor Kwangsu the Prince Regent seized the opportunity of removing the powerful satrap from power. It must be borne in mind that Yuan Shih Kai, who seemed to possess the power of a Warwick the Kingmaker, was a Chinese by race, and the Manchus regarded him with secret fear; but the question remains open how far the disappearance of the true army reformer of China has affected the new organization of China's military forces. The army now consists mainly of seventy battalions of infantry of 1,000 men each. They are muscular fellows who in stature and physique would compare favorably with any other army in the world. The weak point of the army is believed to be in the regimental officer, but as a matter of fact it is largely in the Government itself. China has never been in greater need of a man than at the present hour. For whilst there are great forces at work which should make for regeneration, there is apparently no one to control or guide those forces, and, failing such control or guidance, they may either waste themselves in ill-directed efforts or they may break out into violent explosion. Yuan Shih Kai was perhaps never a statesman in the highest sense of the word. He had not the necessary knowledge or education. His character was in many respects not beyond reproach. But he possessed judgment and strength of will. He had realized that the old isolation of China, even if desirable, was no longer practicable, and that if China was to take her place amongst the nations she must equip herself with the material weapons and adopt the methods of organization which could alone enable her to meet them on equal terms. He had for the first time introduced order and discipline into her armed forces and what he knew to be the basis of order and discipline, adequate and punctual payment. As Governor of Shantung and Viceroy of Chih-li he had done something even to reorganize the administration of those provinces, and with a freer hand in Pekin his will-power might have infused some measure of energy into the amorphous organism of the Central Government. At least, so long as he was in Pekin there was some one who in any serious emergency could be relied upon to act with decision. For he was not afraid of responsibility, and he knew that it is deeds that count and not words. Since his disappearance there seems to be no driving power anywhere. Neither foreigners nor Chinese are able to name any one individual or group of individuals who exercises any decisive influence on the course of public affairs. The Prince Regent is still an unknown quantity. In home affairs he seems to lean mostly on the Manchus, and it is amongst the Manchus that, to the surprise of many foreign observes, some of the most progressive elements are at present to be found. The old Empress was, of course, a Manchu, and at Court the Manchus were always dominant, but it was upon Chinese that she mainly relied for all executive and administrative work. Even before her death, however, a tendency showed itself to increase the number of Manchu officials on the Government boards and in the highest administrative posts of the Empire, and that under the present regency. If one can pick out here and there isolated examples of what can be achieved by individual effort, it only serves to bring into relief the lamentable absence of any collective or co-ordinated effort. The masterful hand of the old Empress at least steered the ship—sometimes, it is true, almost on to the breakers—but under her hand the ship at any rate obeyed its helm. The present rulers of China are face to face with a situation in many respects more complex and difficult than ever before. In the first place, whereas formerly the Chinese people accepted misgovernment with a sort of passive resignation, as if it constituted some providential dispensation at which it was useless to cavil, there is now a very large and exceedingly articulate section which not only resents it, but denounces it in the most vigorous terms. A native press has sprung into being which is already a power in the land, and it rings every day with protests against the corruption and incompetence of the Administration.

A Connemara Tragedy

- Sergeant: "On the head, with the shoulder of it."
- Prisoner: "It was on the head I shtruck her."

- John: "Ay, and the wall all shpattered with blood."
- Constable: "Sure it wasn't the head of the tongs at all."

Clerk (correcting): "On the head with the shoulder," etc.

And so on. The dreary little tragedy was reconstructed step by step, the rich quavering wail of the old woman with the great grey eyes and wrinkled face answering the briefer speech of the men and the sweet quiet tones of the younger woman. Through the open doorway, golden in the dying sunlight, lay all of the world that some of them had ever seen—the plain and

Hewlett's New Novel

Maurice Hewlett will shortly have published a new novel the title of which is still under consideration, but which will probably be "The Open Road." It will be a continuation of his "Halfway House," in which that unconventional nomad, Senhouse, will be the hero. The resemblance between Senhouse and Gower Woodseer of Meredith's "Lord Ormont and his Aminta" has already been noted, and it is well known that Meredith had Robert Louis Stevenson in mind when he conceived the character of Woodseer. Barrie's "Sentimental Tommy" was suggested likewise by certain characteristics of R. L. S., of whom it has been said that if he were cast away in a wilderness he would people the desert not so that he could see the people but so that they might see him. The "Letters to Sanchia," by Hewlett now current in Putnam's, also takes up the character of Senhouse, who is the inditer of the epistles.

"The Bar B Boys"

One of the first of the holiday juveniles to see publication is "The Bar B Boys," which chronicles the beginning of another series with scenes laid in the western cattle country. This first volume is so replete with incident that one wonders what Mr. Edwin L. Sabin has reserved for future recitals, but being a writer experienced in this particular field, no doubt his imagination will furnish adventures enough for half a dozen. Phil Macgowan, convalescent from pneumonia, was on his way to California to recuperate. Crossing the Rocky mountains, as the train slowly zig-zagged over the grade, with an eastern lad's fine contempt for all things western, he stepped off to pluck wild flowers, and before he realized it the train had gathered speed and he was left alone, without an idea of where he was, much less of how he was to go elsewhere. His efforts to cut across and catch up left him only more bewildered and lost than before, and for the first time in his life he spent a night out doors, without shelter, food or fire, but this was only the beginning, for within a few hours after his foolhardy adventure in leaving the train he had fallen in with a gang of cattle rustlers and heard enough of their plans, though he understood nothing, to make it advisable for them to kill or at least capture and hold him. Next he was picked up by a party of Indians, the old chief of which determined to carry him as far west as Utah and hold him for reward, and again the Indian train was overtaken by a party of cattle men who insisted with the Indians that their prize should be released. It happened that the leader of the cattlemen was known to some of Macgowan's relatives and he had no difficulty in gaining the permission of his father to change plans and remain at the Owl Creek Ranch, where he was speedily initiated into the rudiments of "cow punching." Mr. Sabin has written with more care than the average caterer for youthful literary palates, who is apt to forget all else in his eagerness to be "stirring." He has not preached, but he has written in a way that affords both instruction and entertainment. The book is from the press of Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.

"The Game and the Candle"

This is not only an exceptionally good novel as such things go in these days, but a decided novelty as well, since it is probably the first since the "Prisoner of Zenda" in which Americans of either sex and royalties have come together without some sort of an amorous complication. The prologue introduces us to two young men, brothers, sincerely attached to each other. They have been brought up in luxury but now, in their early twenties, they discover that their supposed fortune is a bubble and that they and their beloved aunt and cousin are face to face with poverty. It is out of the power of either of the Allards to earn more than a meager income, but in any case that would not satisfy them and their relatives. An immense fortune is required and immediately. They have no capital with which to speculate or to engage in business, and the only outlook is for one of them to deliberately become a felon, to separate himself from his class and kind, disappear, and in case of retribution, to maintain silence and enforce it on the other. It is the elder brother, John, upon whom the lot falls, and accordingly, he is called away, to South America. Some few years later a gang of counterfeiters is unearthed. All escape save one Leroy, unknown to the authorities, supposed to be French. He refuses the usual immunity offered to the traitor and is sentenced to a long term of imprisonment. In time there comes as a visitor to the prison, the Grand Duke Feodor Stanief, who, recognizes in the trusty polishing brass work a former acquaintance with whom he had spent some pleasant weeks incognito. Moved by the confidence he had learned to place in his unknown friend, he contrives an escape, takes Leroy to the royal yacht and installs him as private secretary. Allard then resumes his own name and station, and the main part of the story deals with his new life in the semi-oriental court where the Grand Duke Feodor, now regent until the coming of age of his young cousin, passes a stormy life of three years of constant suspicion and intrigue directed against his best efforts. The young Emperor Adrian has been trained to distrust, especially of his regent who would be his heir if he were removed, and the one character in whom either has any confidence is the American, John Allard, who has been attached to the imperial household while his heart is with the regent. It is a trying position in which his straight forward honesty is in contrast with the scheming of the court officials, but he acquits himself well. The action focuses in the coronation of the young emporer who, it is assumed, will make the banishment of the Grand Duke Feodor one of his first imperial acts, but, though there is no sudden and violent change of policy, just the opposite proves to be the case. The youthful emperor, unboyish as he is for his years, is something more than a petulant tyrant and has been wise enough to make his own observations and draw his own conclusions to the discomfiture of some of his most confident advisors. Although the story deals with court intrigues and political plots, the usual fascinating adventuress does not appear nor does she even work wires from behind the screen. On the whole it is far more convincing than court novels generally, and once admitting a Grande Duke Feodor, the rest does not make too great a demand on credulity. Eleanor M. Ingram is a new name in the literary calendar but this, her first book, is so far above the average that it awakens pleasurable anticipations for its successors. Published by the Bobbs-Merrill Co.

Sometime ago an act was passed by the United States government authorizing the purchase of an official automobile for Hon. Joseph Cannon, speaker of the house. After the government experts had examined the claims of the various cars they unanimously decided to purchase a Studebaker. Now "Uncle Joe" possesses two of these cars and is constantly seen touring in and around the nation's capital.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 5950, N. S. Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of TOMASSO DEMATTEI, (also known as TOMOSO DEMOTTEI), Deceased.

It appearing to the satisfaction of the Court from the verified petition of CAROLINA DEMATTEI, administratrix of the Estate of TOMASSO DEMATTEI, also known as TOMOSO DEMOTTEI, deceased, on file herein, that it is necessary to sell a part of the estate of said deceased in order to pay the debts, expenses and charges of administration of the estate of said deceased, which have already accrued, and which will or may accrue hereafter during the administration of said estate and that it will be to the best interest, advantage and benefit of said estate and of all the persons interested therein.

It is ordered by the Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said TOMASSO DEMATTEI, also known as TOMOSO DEMOTTEI, deceased, appear before the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, at the Courtroom of Department No. 10 thereof in the Grant Building, situated on the Southeast corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in said County and State, on the 3rd day of November, 1909, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why an order, as prayed for in the petition, should not be granted to the said administratrix to sell all that part of the real estate of said deceased, at either public or private sale, for the purposes mentioned in the petition, as he shall judge to be for the best interests of said estate and of the parties interested therein which said part of said parcel of real property is described as follows:

All that certain piece or parcel of land situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and more particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the Southwesterly line of Holyoke Street distant thereon Two Hundred (200) feet Northwesterly from the Northwesterly line of Silliman Street; running thence Northwesterly and along said Southwesterly line of Holyoke Street Twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Southwesterly One Hundred Twenty (120) feet; thence at right angles Southeasterly Twenty-five (25) feet and thence at right angles Northeasterly One Hundred and Twenty (120) feet to the Southwesterly line of Holyoke Street and the point of commencement.

Being part of Lot No. 1 in Block No. 37, University Homestead Association.

It is further ordered, that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four (4) successive weeks, in "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in said county.

Dated, this 27th day of September, 1909.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 24,299, Dept. 12.

ELLA REEVES, Plaintiff,

vs.

JOHN T. REEVES, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to JOHN T. REEVES, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion and wilful neglect, and determining and adjudging that plaintiff is the owner of the certain real property described in the complaint herein, as her separate property, and also for alimony and counsel fees; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 23d day of July, A. D. 1909.

Once a captain in the army was cornered by the enemy and he addressed his men as follows: "My men, fight like demons until your powder gives out, then run. I'm a little lame, I'll start now."

Easily Found.—Recently when looking for the horse of a cousin in a town unfamiliar to myself, I inquired of a passing negro where I should find it. "Down dar, sir," he replied, indicating a number of houses down the road. "What's the number?" "You'll find dat on de door, sir."

It was during the Civil War that a captain of a New York regiment was inspecting his company. At length he came to one private whose shirt was badly begrimed. "Patrick O'Flynn!" called out the officer. "Here, yer honor," promptly responded Patrick, with his hand to his cap. "How long do you wear a shirt?" "Twenty-eight inches," was the rejoinder.

Judge Lindley, of the St. Louis Circuit Court, like many another good judge, is fond of a quiet joke. A raw German, who had been summoned for jury duty, desired to be relieved. "Schudge," he said, "I can nicht understand English goot." Looking over the crowded bar, his eye filled with humor, the judge replied: "Oh; you can serve! You won't have to understand good English. You won't hear any here."

While Mr. Webster was once addressing the Senate on the subject of international improvements, and every Senator was listening with close attention, the Senate clock commenced striking, but instead of striking twice at 2 p. m., continued to strike without cessation more than forty times. All eyes were turned to the clock, and Mr. Webster remained silent until the clock struck about twenty, when he thus appealed to the chair: "Mr. President, the clock is out of order! I have the floor!" To say that a long and loud laugh from every Senator and person in the august chamber was indulged in is a faint description of the merriment this exquisite pun produced.

Patrick Murphy was conspicuous for a very homely face. He used to say that it seemed like "an offince to the landscape," a conclusion in which his acquaintances fully concurred; and he was as poor as he was homely. One day a neighbor met him and said: "And how are ye, Pat?" "Mighty bad," was the reply. "It is shtarvation that is starin' me in the face." "If that is so," said his neighbor, "sure and it can't be very pleasant for aither of ye!"

Wu Ting Fang, His Excellency the Chinese Minister, on one occasion listened with intense approval and much industry of thought to William Gillette's performance of his own play, "Secret Service," and asked in reverential courtesy to be presented to the actor-author. Into Gillette's four-by-six milk-white dressing room crowded his excellency and his suite, all bowing gracefully and unrolling their pretty little tan hands from silk sleeves to be clasped in Gillette's firm American grasp. "Do you work this way every night for many weeks?" asked the diplomat, driving a piercing glance at Mr. Gillette. "Yes; many months, and years if people will stand it." "How do you make this sort of a play—so beautiful a story—not interfered with in any way by the characters?" To this question Mr. Gillette could not unfold an impromptu drama-recipe, so he took refuge in the ambush of the special Gellette wit in its solemn vein of boyishness, and answered, "The best way is to write your play first, and then chuck in the characters where they do the least harm."

Two Supervisors

Harassed by clashing parties, opposed opinions and the passionate discussions of perspiring artisans of speech, the popular mind, vibrating to clamorous appeals, finds it somewhat difficult to take a calm and rational view of things. So much noise is being made by the candidates for two of the offices of our city government, that none of the other candidates are able to make themselves heard above the din. It were well in the circumstances that the people should close their ears and do a little thinking. They should consider, for example, the character and affiliations of the men who are candidates for the Board of Supervisors. Many of the incumbents who are candidates for re-election are commending themselves to us on the score of their honesty. They are said to be honest because of them it is generally conceded that they would scorn to take a bribe in money. Now it is well to remember the old proverb, "The more honesty a man has the less he affects the air of a saint." It is also well to inquire, "What is honesty?" A poet has made reply that he is an honest man "whom neither force nor fawning can unpin or wrench from giving all their due." How many Supervisors of the current dispensation are guided by this principle of honesty? We regard it as somewhat significant that two of them have not been endorsed by the Good Government League, a political organization that makes subserviency to two tyrannical millionaires the test of efficiency in public office. Now in our opinion these two Supervisors—Comte and Broderick—are more deserving of the confidence of the people than any of their associates. Their honesty in the vulgar acceptation of the term, is as far above question as that of any of the puppets of the men who employ the forces of government to punish their enemies; not even by the Good Government League is the honesty of either Comte or Broderick questioned. The refusal of that League's endorsement, is, we take it, a priceless tribute to the character of the rejected ones, since it implies that they are devoted to that exalted principle of honesty which enjoins a square deal to everybody in spite of force and fawning. We bespeak in behalf of Comte and Broderick the support of the voters of San Francisco.

Seducing the Mob

From the veracious dailies we learn that the tender-conscienced virtuoso of the Spreckels cabal is still circulating through the town, calling Heaven and Earth to witness the sincerity and righteousness of his purpose. How patient and indulgent are the dear people! Without the slightest fear of public ribaldry this unblushing patriot for revenue only, whose record of dissimulation and deceit is now an open book, solicits with his old-time effrontery the favor of the rabble. From all accounts he is as blithe and debonair as in the days not long past when, with a duplicate immunity contract in his pocket, he was painting word pictures of the unspeakable Ruef in convict's garb and eructating invective against the weekly press for leveling against him the awful accusation of taking money from Spreckels. Mr. Heney has been found out; has been found to be even worse than his enemies suspected, and yet so far as the mob is concerned the spell of his fascination has not been broken. Of course his following has undergone a perceptible diminution, but the credulity of the class whose raw passions he appeals to has not been exhausted. Among them there are no signs of an awakening. Not all of them, perhaps, regard him as a man of bracing moral influence, but they certainly believe that he can make a great deal of trouble for men of wealth, and they dearly love to see rich men pursued. Mr. Heney is addressing himself to this particular class with great fervor. When last heard from he was advancing as a reason why the voters of San Francisco should support him that in the event of his election Patrick Calhoun will have to put a million dollars in circulation. This is the sort of argument that thrills the hysterical multitude, and doubtless it is approved by the culturines of the Women's Heney Club who have yet to realize that what they stand for is the corrupting of justice to reclaim a city.

Where The Money Comes From

The thrifty Heney estimates that up to date the graft prosecution has cost Patrick Calhoun a million dollars, and he believes he is calculating conservatively when he predicts that further fruitless prosecution will entail the expenditure of a million more for defensive purposes. He argues therefore that it is to the interest of the people from the pecuniary standpoint to co-operate with him in his efforts to stimulate the flow of wealth from Calhoun's plethoric purse through the thirsty channels of trade. This unquestionably is a captivating argument for persons in a state of intellectual abeyance who are immune from what is known as an insult to intelligence. Also a disingenuous argument this, but nevertheless it throws a white light on the current inspiration of the Graft Prosecution. The conviction of Calhoun is of course a consummation recognized as hopeless by Heney and his masters, but as there is infinite gratification for this implacable crew in the harassing of the object of their vindictiveness they are appealing with all the lungs they are able to hire for the facilities to carry on their beautiful enterprise. The election of Heney will certainly enable our sinister patriots to "bleed" Patrick Calhoun, but are we to feel that the more we are plagued the less we are to be concerned? Are we to derive any benefit from this species of phlebotomy? While Calhoun has been spending money for the defense of himself against the infamous methods of Heney and Burns have not the taxpayers of San Francisco been spending their money to lighten the burdens of that bloated young bondholder who presides over the destines of the First National Bank? This distinguished son of an illustrious sire is not such a game sport as the newspaper lackeys and kept lawyers, the panders and parasites who are getting a living by the sweat of their tongue, would have us believe. Though the possessor of a purse not less tumid than his high-blown arrogance this illiterate young millionaire is no spendthrift. His capacity to horde money more than balances his aptitude for disbursement. Before he began venting his spleen against Calhoun he was never tracked by the nickels he dropped. The money that he has spent in the indulgence of his conceit and vindictiveness is a drop in the bucket compared with what his private feud has cost the people of this city. Mr. Spreckels inherited a sense of thrift that restrains him from throwing money to the birds. Above all things a good hater, he will go some distance in the pursuit of revenge, but inexhaustible as that ugly, primal passion is in the Spreckels breast it is less luxuriant than the consuming love of gold. Hence the vociferous solicitation of subscriptions from the unsophisticated, and the quartering of an army of gumshoe men at the public crib. For every dollar that has been spent by Rudolph Spreckels on his moral unlift the easy taxpayers of San Francisco have spent ten. Spreckels has supported a few cheap lawyers and he has spent some money on spies, editors and parsons, but all the while we, the plain people, have been under prodigious expense. We have been paying the salaries of numerous officials, who, had they been attending to the ordinary routine of business, would have saved us many thousands of dollars which were spent for the support of prisoners who have been awaiting trial at our expense in the county jail, but who should either be at liberty or living at the expense of the State in the penitentiary. We have permitted the personally conducted graft prosecution to monopolize two courts for nearly three years. We have spent a fortune on juries and another fortune on spies. The Graft Prosecution has certainly put a great deal of money in circulation, but most of it has come from the City Treasury. Mr. Heney and Mr. Burns are doubtless eager to keep up the steady flow of the pactolian stream, for they are growing rich, and incidentally they are facing the prospect of being themselves pursued for some of the things that have been done in the name of justice. If the continuance of the feud is desirable as a means of circulating money, why not put Mr. Spreckels himself on the defensive for awhile and compel both millionaires to rely on their own financial resources? The mob that hates the rich ought to be able to derive as much gratification from the pursuit of Spreckels as from the hounding of Calhoun.

Dr. Eliot's Idealism

Some time ago Dr. Eliot, formerly of Harvard, promulgated the principles of a religion grounded in ethics without supernatural authority. At the time Dr. Eliot gave utterance to his views on this subject we did not suppose he was laboring under the delusion that he had given birth to a new idea. Nor have we any reason now for supposing that Dr. Eliot regards himself as the prophet of a new sect, but we find that his views have been seized upon by many magazine and university philosophers who believe that the man from Harvard has given them something worth experimenting with in the interest of mankind. Which goes to prove that nothing seems so new as that which is extremely old. Dr. Eliot's system of religion is nothing more than a rehash of Matthew Arnold's Moral Idealism, the basic idea of which is that conduct is three-fourths of life. Matthew Arnold conceived that all would go well in this world if men guided by higher principles would lean on their own character and trust to their noblest sentiments. Yet for that brilliant essayists theories of religion we have only to turn to the study of Confucius to see the same views exhibited with an elaborateness, a finish and a consistency in comparison with which the teachings of our modern idealists are but the vaporings of superficial thinkers. The religious views of Dr. Eliot come as far-off echoes from "the teacher of ten thousand ages," the "most holy, prescient sage Confucius," as his disciples loved to call him. Now Confucius like Dr. Eliot believed that man could attain a high moral and intellectual place by personal virtue, by right feeling, by correctness of purpose and cultivation of the mind. He did not think it necessary to practice any of the forms of religion that Dr. Eliot would have us reject in favor of a species of idealism. Dr. Eliot is unable to sympathize with the wants of minds constituted different from his own. So was Confucius. The state of feeling which makes reliance on the unseen Powers the only consolation of the soul was beyond the comprehension of the Chinese sage. Spiritual beings Confucius did not care to discuss. Now what would Confucius find were he to visit to-day the people to whom he gave a national religion? He would find that while his name is venerated, while every line that he ever wrote is cherished with a respect similar to that which the orthodox Jew entertains for the Pentateuch, the Mahommedan for the Koran, at the same time in every shrine he would see offerings to genii and demons, to spirits and spectres; and he would see aspiring scholars burning incense to win the favor of gods and propitiate the anger of devils. In short he would see that the enemy had entered in at the door he had neglected to guard. Despite the great influence of Confucius, the Dr. Eliot of China, the idealist and preacher of scientific ethics, the Chinese are today the most superstitious people on the face of the earth. Is there nothing of significance in this to the idealists who have failed to appreciate the religion that has its domain in the recesses of the soul and that finds expression in the piety that communes with God through the spiritual balm of prayer?

Our Pacific Shipping

That American shipping on the Pacific is declining and that it is in danger of total extinction is the opinion of Dr. Ernest Schultze, who in a German magazine draws a very gloomy picture of conditions and makes pessimistic predictions as to the future of our merchant marine especially as regards trade between the United States and the Orient. He calls attention to the fact that our wheat shipments to Japan are now exceeded by our imports of Japanese goods, and that our cotton trade with China was only one-sixth the amount in 1907 that it was in 1906—a condition brought about, he says, by the anger of the Chinese who, offended at the treatment they received from the United States, refused to buy our cotton goods. Besides this falling off in exports the shipping trade in the Pacific Ocean is deserting all other flags and is turning to that of Japan. The sharp competition of the Japanese is looked upon by the writer quoted as a most serious factor. "How has the Japanese merchant marine been able to attain such success?" he asks. "But fifteen years ago,' he says in answer to his own question, "outside of the paltry sampans used in coast trade they had scarcely any merchant vessels. The policy of exclusion so religiously followed for three centuries had totally ruined Japanese shipping. It is only in the last twelve years that Japan has sent her ships to China, India, Australia, England, and America. The coastwise trade of East Asia is almost exclusively carried on by the Japanese lines, which send out their vessels at least once a week. The ship-subsidies granted by the Japanese Government have contributed greatly to this rapid development. But it must be borne in mind that the government was in a large measure forced into this policy; so many steamers were acquired in the war with Russia and so much capital had been expended upon them that some use had to be found for them after the war; and added to them were the captured vessels. That for the rest the Japanese would be able to develop a shipping of the present magnitude they themselves would likely have doubted as late as ten years ago. Their ships were then commanded by white captains—mostly Americans or Englishmen. The crew, too, were mostly Americans, only secondarily Japanese or Chinese. Today officers and crew of the two greatest Japanese marine companies are almost exclusively Japanese or Chinese. The pay of the yellow sailors is notoriously very much lower than that of the whites, while their board, too, is far less expensive. In addition to this, ship-building is much cheaper in Japan than in America, even overlooking the fact that the shipyards also receive government aid. But wages are materially lower in Japan than in North America; while wood, which is still the most indispensable material for ships, is considerably cheaper than in the United States. For Japan still possesses twenty million hectares of well-cultivated forests, while the United States, though still in command of stately stretches of woodland, has suffered frightfully through the irresponsible devastation which has been going on for decades. What the Japanese did not until recently possess and had to purchase at high rates from abroad were marine-engines, steel-plates, rivets, etc., but the government has established large work-shops in order that such things, too, may be furnished at home as far as possible. Thus Japanese shipping in the Pacific is steadily undermining not only American but European shipping also. The tonnage of their merchant marine rose from 477,430 tons in 1898 to 1,115,880 tons in 1907." The only ray of hope that Dr. Schultze sees is that Japan may bankrupt herself in paying subsidies.

Perspective Impressions

Theodore Roosevelt has congratulated Peary. On what? Doubtless on having called Cook a liar.

Next week we shall learn whether we really like to be embittered by human malignity.

The selection of a liveryman as King of the Portola was not, let us hope, intended as a rebuke to the effete monarchies of Europe. We have no taste for international complications.

"The keynote of our campaign," said the chairman of a Leland meeting, "is the home, and—." At this point a peculiar noise distracted the speaker. On investigation it was ascertained that Jimmy Phelan had snickered in his sleeve.

"William Hoff Cook opened his address," says the Examiner, "by stating that this was not a campaign of apology." As this is the same Cook that divulged a private conversation with his brother for campaign purposes it seems like a joke for him to pose as an authority on the amenities of polite society.

Listen to Fuzzy-Wuzzy; hear the whiskered poet sing his own panegyric; mark him as he points to himself with pride; hark as he chants the glad song of self-approval: "That this event (the carnival) should have been carried so successfully off as to become monumental in the history of the city just before my administration is to come to a close seems almost like a crown upon it." From this it is evident that Fuzzy-Wuzzy really knew that we had a carnival.

Behind the Scenes of the Portola

Being an Appreciation of the Committeemen Who Have Overturned All Precedents by Subordinating Their Personalities to Their Aims; Also a Feeble Attempt to Do Them the Honor They Deserve

By Edward F. O'Day

So effectually was the machinery of the Portola festival hidden from public view that only the participants in the labor of preparation and a few newspapermen realized the tremendous amount of work that was being done. Had the carnival turned out a failure there would have been the usual army of "knockers" seeking out the responsible persons to load them with contumely and the still more irritating army of epimethean wiseacres discoursing volubly of what ought to have been done. Most fortunately however the Portola festival was so far from being a failure that that dreary word which a great playwright blotted out of the lexicon of youth has never once suggested itself in connection with a single item of the five days' celebration. The Portola was an epoch-making success for San Francisco, a success, we may be optimistic enough to hope, which will have far-reaching effects upon our future. That being the case it is not surprising that everybody should be curious for a look at the aforesaid effectually hidden machinery; that they should be exhibiting a belated interest in the men who started the Portola and in the methods which they adopted to carry it to so extraordinarily happy a consummation. In the aftermath of discussion there has been unstinting praise bestowed upon these men and their methods; but to most of the praise-givers the men have remained anonymous and their methods unexplained. That is a unique feature of the Portola and one to which too much significance cannot be attached. Hitherto in our local celebrations there has been no such modesty on the part of the workers. The names of innumerable committees and an intolerable number of photographs of the "active workers" have been published in all the papers; there have been rivalries for the limelight and jealousies when one distinguished citizen received more prominence than another; with the result that the bickering and ill-feeling have cast their shadow over the celebration and diminished its success. With the Portola celebration it would almost seem that we have entered upon a new era of development in which this provincialism is to disappear and we are at last to experience the delights of a liberal and unselfish civic spirit. If Don Gaspar de Portola has really discovered a new San Francisco we must never allow his memory to fade.

To tell here the origin of the Portola will serve the purpose of giving due credit to the men behind the scenes of the spectacle. In the parlous days after the fire, when all knew that the movement of business would naturally tend toward the old downtown center but when many feared that the reflux would be slow, uncertain and disorganized, San Francisco developed a wide-awake and thoroughly efficient Downtown Association. One of this association's achievements was the last New Year's Eve celebration which revived the carnival spirit that had been slumbering since the disaster of 1906 and infused renewed determination into our businessmen to return as quickly as possible to their old locations. Only the rain interfered with the complete success of that festive night; in all the elements which human foresight and effort could control it was a pronounced triumph. Best of all, from the business viewpoint, it left no deficit to be made up; the association footed every bill. W. D. Fennimore was president of the association at the time of that celebration but shortly afterwards Andrew G. McCarthy succeeded him. Impressed with the abilities displayed by the executive committee, Dent H. Robert, the general manager of the San Francisco and Los Angeles Examiners, suggested to McCarthy that the association immediately lay plans for another celebration a year later, designed on bigger lines and so advertised as to draw visitors from all parts of the country. McCarthy called a meeting of the executive committee and the project was heartily indorsed. At that meeting of the committee were present Andrew G. McCarthy, P. T. Clay, Milton H. Esberg, John A. Hammersmith, Edgar D. Peixotto, Paul T. Carroll, Robert A. Roos, W. D. Fennimore and Vincent Whitney. Clay was chosen chairman of the executive committee for the new festival and to the men who have been mentioned were added Louis Sloss, James Rolph Jr., James A. Johnston, J. H. Crothers of the Bulletin, Charles W. Hornick of the Call, Dent H. Robert of the Examiner, Charles De Young of the Chronicle, S. Fred Hogue of the Post, Charles C. Moore, Governor Gillett and Mayor Taylor. Homer Boushey, an experienced newspaperman, was made executive secretary.

With this unusually representative working force the plans for the festival rapidly matured. Fearing that a repetition of the fete at New Year's might again be the signal for the disfavor of the pluvian god, the committee took counsel of the weather bureau and found that for twenty-five years there had been no rain in San Francisco between October 19 and 23. Thereupon it was decided to hold a five days' fete covering that dry spot in the calendar. Much ransacking of Bancroft followed and several members of the committee simultaneously dragged old Don Gaspar from obscurity to serve as the motif of the celebration. After considerable difficulty the official sanction of the city government was obtained for the Portola festival and the preparations began in earnest. With the most spectacular items of preparation all San Francisco is familiar. It was Vincent Whitney who suggested that foreign governments be invited to send warships to the fiesta and although the idea was considered too ambitious by many members of the committee who feared the ridicule which would attach to a failure, Charles C. Moore offered to undertake this part of the preparation. How Moore broke through the meshes of red tape at Washington and had himself accredited by the state department as a special ambassador to the courts of Europe is a story in itself and everybody knows of his brilliant success. It was the presence of the foreign warships in our harbor which drew the eyes of the world to the Portola and helped to bring the Dutch and Spanish ministers to San Francisco. Another spectacular element of the festival was the President's toast to San Francisco which was drunk all over the world and the credit for which belongs to Robert A. Roos who also engineered the cheering of the school children in New York and Chicago at the same hour that the toast was drunk by their elders.

These were pleasant auspices but when the committee started out to collect funds they had many disheartening experiences. They found San Francisco unenthusiastic and sceptical about the celebration. Money was scarce, they were told, and could not be afforded for a celebration which after all its booming would probably settle down to a village festival with the usual queen of beauty. These were not the only criticisms; men who withheld their money were lavish of ridicule and banter. Along the streets, in the clubs, at the exchanges and wherever the members of the Portola committee went they were freely derided for their enthusiastic efforts to father a doubtful experiment. That these men per-

The Yellow Overcoat

By Henry F. Urban (From the German)

Old Claflin was proud of two of his sons who were in trade, but of his third son Winfred he never spoke without wrinkling his forehead. "He is a good-for-nothing," he once said of Winfred. "He writes—makes verses, and of course he doesn't make a living."

With Winfred Claflin, who was said to be a little "off," things really did not go particularly well. He lived in New York between Madison avenue and Park avenue, in a house where everything creaked and rattled. It had formerly been a private residence; then the owner had changed it into a "studio-building" and given it the pompous name "The Apollo." Only artist lived there: a painter, a comic-magazine illustrator, an Italian singing teacher, a German music-teacher, an architect, a lady who photographed infants, and a French fencing-master named de Mirabelle. The latter claimed to be a Count waiting for a great inheritance in France. Claflin was the only representative of belles lettres. His abode was in the top story, the fourth, at the rear. It consisted of a little workroom with two windows, a tiny alcove, in which he slept, and a still tinier bathroom. Herr Weiss, the German landlord, served breakfast in the room at a moderate cost. Frau Weiss kept the room tidy, also at a moderate price.

The roomers knew one another, visited one another now and then, and talked about their great hopes and great misfortunes, though Claflin was considered the most unfortunate. He had published three volumes of poems and two novels, which only a few knew, and had written two comedies which lay in some theatre-office or other. Just now he had another volume of stories at the publishers. If he had not been a permanent assistant on a weekly paper, he would have been at his wit's end.

Moreover, he was by no means a young man, but along in his thirty's. Already his wits were beginning to shine through the hair on the top of his head, as he used to say. But his slim figure and his beardless face, with its prominent Indian nose and satirical mouth, made him look younger than he was.

Winter had brought the last piece of ill-luck. Claflin needed a new overcoat and had not enough money for one. Already it was becoming unpleasantly cold. He improved matters by putting on his cotton summer underwear, his half-woolen autumn underwear over that, and his all-wool winter underclothes on top. That kept him warm. When he met acquaintances who remarked, "Cold today, isn't it?" he answered with a smile:

"Cold? You are joking. To me it's quite comfortable."

Fortunately, after a few weeks he got a cheque for three poems and a short story. Eight dollars of it were left for a winter overcoat.

"Eight dollars for an overcoat?" said the painter, the illustrator, the music-teacher, the piano-teacher, the architect, the photographer of infants, and Count de Mirabelle. "We are anxious to know where you'll find one. For that amount you would only get the lining of a coat."

But Claflin did not despair. He went into a well-known shop down town and said:

"I need a winter overcoat, but I can't pay more than eight dollars for it. Have you such a coat?"

"Sorry," said the clerk with a smile. "We have none under fifteen dollars and they are nothing extra."

Claflin went away. In every decent shop he received the same unfavorable reply. Just as he was turning to go out of the fourteenth shop, the clerk remarked:

"A moment, sir. We have a very odd coat which an Englishman had made to order for himself but didn't call for, because he had to hurry off to Argentina. We could probably give it to you for that price."

He went to the back of the shop and returned with the coat. It was a most unusual garment, of a cut unparalleled in all New York. But the queerest thing was the color, a shrieking yellow. Down the front, it had two long rows of dark-brown buttons, each as large as a silver dollar, and above a high collar of dark-brown velvet.

"Oh holy Apollo!" cried Claflin in horror. "This cut, and above all this color are impossible! There would be a revolution if I should appear on the street with it."

"Yes, it's pretty yellow, I admit," answered the salesman. "But these Englishmen often have curious tastes. The gentleman wanted it made just so, no different. At any rate it is nice and warm. Just look at the lining. And it's of excellent material. It will last for years. And then—it will never turn yellow!" The clerk laughed heartily at this joke. Claflin also laughed.

"Quite right," he assented. "It can't very well become much yellower. But would it fit?"

"Try it right on."

Claflin slipped into the coat which the clerk held for him. It reached almost to his feet.

"It sets as if moulded to you," said the clerk, and he stroked the coat admiringly. "Just look in the mirror."

"Hm—it really does set as if moulded." Claflin viewed himself from all sides. "What a canary bird! Don't you think I look like a canary?"

"But like a very prosperous canary." The clerk snorted again.

"And like a warm canary," continued Claflin. "Unquestionably it is comfortable plumage. But, as I said, it is impossible. Wait, though—not at all." An idea seemed to have struck him suddenly. "I'll take it even though the sparrows should fall dead on account of it. I'll keep it right on. Here are the eight dollars. You can send me the old overcoat," he added with a smile, and the clerk guffawed again.

He intended to walk home, although it was cold and cloudy. It was about four o'clock in the afternoon. He remarked at once that he was exciting attention. Everyone who is dressed differently from others excites notice in America, for it is the land of uniformity. People who met him, smiled.

A boy who drove past him on a truck called out in a gay voice:

"Hey! Who let that canary out?"

Whereupon some one answered, "Don't frighten him—he may fly away!"

Claflin heard it all without worrying. On the contrary a sort of roguish joy was in his face. Besides, he felt wonderfully comfortable in his coat. That was the principal thing. Proud as a millionaire he strutted up Broadway.

"A very sensational garment," people said and stared back until they ran against the lamp-posts.

Street-car conductors who saw the overcoat forgot to ring up the fares. Cab-drivers ran into one another with their carriages and cursed so loud that the panes rattled in the houses. Policemen wondered whether they had a madman on their hands and if they should telephone for a hospital ambulance with straight-jackets. Everyone was sure about one thing, that the yellow man could not possibly be an American, but came from some place else, probably from England or Germany or France, or even from Russia. Everyone on reaching home would rush into the house with the news:

"This afternoon I saw something incredible. On

The Portola a Success

Now that our blood which raced feverishly along during last week's festival has slackened to its ordinary work-a-day pulsation I think that we can take stock of what we planned and what we accomplished in something of a cold impartial spirit. Looking at the Portola celebration in this fashion I do not hesitate to say that it was an overwhelmingly successful affair; in fact I do not believe it to be exaggeration to add that it was a success which transcended all the expectations of the most optimistic San Franciscans. I think that Charles C. Moore, Andrew McCarthy, Dent Robert and the other gentlemen who organized the festival have exhibited qualities of administration which they never before knew that they possessed; they surprised and outdid themselves. The streets of San Francisco never before knew such tremendous crowds; I think it is not rash to estimate that on different days of the carnival there were at least one million souls within our gates. And such crowds as they were! Not the dour, frowning, unprepossessing and closefisted men and women who have come before in many thousands on occasion of some religious or fraternal convention, but the pick of the earth, a merry-hearted laughing invasion of revelers who knew and loved San Francisco's ways and scattered their appreciation and their money with an ungrudging hand. It was the crowd, the San Franciscans and the visitors, which made the Portola carnival a glorious success. Although the hard-working committees devised various ingenious ways of amusing old and young, the revelers contrived a hundred others for themselves and bade defiance to time and fatigue in their mad glad hunt for excitement.

The Undiscriminating Papers

For various reasons the newspapers were careful to censor all Portola news which did not reflect credit upon everybody interested and they were equally careful to exercise no discrimination in lauding the entertainments of the different days. One might imagine by reading them that all the three processions were equally beautiful; that there were no jarring notes at any time in the general chorus of happy revelry; in fact that the festival went off with a clock-work precision and a miraculous absence of blunders. This of course was not the case and none know it so well as the editors and newspaper proprietors who helped to manage the celebration. No newspaper would dare to say that in the big parade of Thursday the native sons with their time-honored but very tiresome and unimaginative displays were completely outdistanced by the Chinese and Japanese who exhibited a gorgeousness of coloring and a fine taste of decoration which filled the eye and the mind like a glowing dream of the orient. As a matter of fact it was the Chinese and Japanese who made the Thursday parade an artistic success while some of the orders and associations and parlors which participated did everything in their power to make it vulgar. Again on Saturday night the Chinese and Japanese achieved an artistic triumph, bewildering the onlookers by the elaborate richness of their display. The floats, I think, were rather disappointing. So much had been written about them that no doubt we were lead to expect too much. One alone came up to my expectations and that was Haig Patigian's effective conception of the god of sunshine.

Queen Vergilia's Difficult Position

Anybody, from reading the newspapers, would imagine that last week was a succession of soul-satisfying triumphs for beautiful Miss Bogue, but unfortunately that was not the case. Queen Vergilia had a very trying time of it, and it is immensely to her credit that she bravely hid all traces of the unhappiness which she was forced to endure by envious and selfish women. There is no gainsaying that Miss Bogue was every inch a queen; divinely tall and most divinely fair, she comported herself on every occasion with a stately and winning dignity which entirely justified her choice as the supreme figure of the carnival. It was not until the splendid possibilities of the Portola festival dawned upon the ladies of our exclusive society that they began to realize the position which Miss Bogue would occupy. They found that it was to be no village festival at which she was to preside and that she was to be no tawdry and ridiculous goddess of liberty; but that she was to queen it in a carnival of so much international interest that foreign ministers and the officers of crack foreign battleships counted it an honor and a delight to be present. When some of our society ladies—and not a small number, either—appreciated fully the glorious bigness of the Portola they surrendered themselves to the influence of the green-eyed monster. Their unfriendly attitude was first made apparent during the reception at the St. Francis on the first day of the celebration. Miss Bogue was there submitted to an ordeal beside which "the third degree" would be a pleasant diversion. Dames with tongues that have been sharpened through constant use stood within hearing distance of her and sought to wither her with lorgnette and caustic remarks. Dainty damsels of her own age who ought to be open-hearted and kind, turned up their noses and let her know that she was not going to have their homage. Miss Bogue bore it bravely with an appearance of unconsciousness of it all which won the hearts of those who entertained no envy or jealousy and accordingly had room in their breasts for unfeigned admiration. The same sort of treatment continued throughout the festival. At the grand ball at the Fairmont many of these women not only kept a studied distance from the queen but withheld their men also. It was the same story at the masquerade ball too. Members of the committee who found time to dance with some of the ultra smart maids and matrons on the floor completely overlooked Queen Vergilia. Of course the secret of this snubbing is that these society women who are more exclusive than human and prouder of their social standing than of their reputation for womanly kindness, felt that they had made a grievous mistake in allowing Miss Bogue to capture the honors of the greatest week in the history of San Francisco. Everyone of them felt that she or her daughter would much more fitly queen it in the presence of ministers and naval and army officers. Having committeed a blunder of judgment in the beginning by sniffing at the festival, they saw their mistake too late and sought most ungenerously to punish Miss Bogue for it. Next time San Francisco has a carnival, I venture to predict, society will offer its fairest flowers in competition for queenly honors; but I doubt that we shall ever be able to find a more queenly queen than Vergilia I.

Society's Stamp of Approval

The attitude which a great part of society maintained toward Miss Bogue was shown toward the whole festival before it was well under way. All the hammers of all the knockers swung in a deafening chorus whenever the ball at the Fairmont was mentioned in the hearing of our elect. Of course, they said, New Greenway might take charge of it, but it would be a mixed gathering of all sorts and conditions of men and women outside the pale of exclusiveness and really, you know, it would be no place for us. That sort of talk was very common. Yet when the time came the most exclusive sets were brilliantly represented at the ball. Society had changed its mind. There were to be distinguished visitors present; men whom it would be an honor and a pleasure to meet. So society went to the ball and enjoyed it immensely. Exactly the same process of reasoning with regard to the masquerade ball resulted in a surpassing success for that function also. Society had loaned some of its best men to manage the affair and at the last moment decided to go and help them out. It had no reason to regret its decision.

Risque Revels at the Masquerade

There are many toothsome morsels of gossip in circulation since that masquerade ball. One of them concerns a doubly-gilt scion of millions who only recently arrived in town after a long absence. He did not leave the masquerade when the rest of the brilliant box-party of which he was a member ordered their limousines; but without seeking the shelter of a mask, he strolled down to the floor and soon joined a gay party of women as frail as they were beautiful. All unmindful of the looks that were bestowed upon him by the curious he kept the wine flowing generously and devoted himself to a violent flirtation with a girl who is known familiarly wherever the mad lights gleam along the city's long night line. A near-by party speculated on the sort of scene which would have ensued had this millionaire darling of society been surprised by his wife at that unpropitious juncture. But if the onlookers were intensely interested at this daring disregard of the conventions they fairly gasped when this millionaire's brother dashed up to the wine-laden table and waltzed off into the center of the Auditorium with another beauty of the democratic social set who distributed proud stares to those of her acquaintances who dared to hail her in such lofty company.

A Disappointed Domino

Really this particular table was not only the cynosure of all neighboring eyes but it was as redolent of adventure as of champagne. Another of its frail occupants, gowned and jeweled in an exquisite taste which made her beauty quite dazzling, attracted the attention of a handsome young chap who is visiting this city and who will have a long tale of adventures to retail to his intimates when he returns to the Antipodes. The attraction was evidently mutual, for when he came forward to request a dance she laid her diamonded arm on his black domino and away they went together. They had not one but several dances, keeping up an interested conversation as they promenaded in the pauses of the music. To say that the black domino was enthralled is putting it mildly. When he finally returned to his friends and asked one of them who knows the town tolerably well, the name of his enchantress, he was astounded at the answer which included several piquant particulars of her career. "By Jove," he commented, "I thought they were ——— ———'s guests (naming the millionaire at the table) and that I was dancing with one of the socially elect." And then, being a very sensible chap with no particular desire to invade society's inclosure, he laughed heartily at his own expense and ordered the wine.

When the Dawn Was Coming

These incidents of course occurred after three o'clock when most of the boxes were deserted and careful mamas had crowded their glowing-cheeked daughters into taxis and whirled them away to bed. It was a feverish rout for the following hour. The last faint shadows of conventionality were banished and folly reigned supreme over a hilarious court. I am not going to tell all that happened in that furious crescendo of mirth. You may have heard whispers of a gay society girl and a joyous matron who danced a can-can which would have been applauded at the Bal Bullier. You may have heard of the young chap, much sought of managing mamas, who insisted on dancing with the young woman who displayed her attractive figure in tights. You may have been told of the pretty daughter of a man of national repute who came from the St. Francis, unaccompanied by the gay widow who presented her to society in Los Angeles and who yielded to nobody in her enjoyment of the exciting scene. And you may have caught some fleeting whisper about the beautiful wife of one of our prominent lawyers who, much earlier in the evening, startled the ladies in the cloak room by producing a jeweled cigarette case and puffing away with unconcealed enjoyment. I suppose the story of the fight between a burly fellow who had obtained, nobody knows how, a committee domino, and a waiter who did not pour his champagne properly is public property. It is not complete unless the narrative describes how Willus Britt rushed into the melee and separated the combatants without even changing the angle of his long black cigar. You may infer that the revels were rowdyish as well as hilarious but remember that these unpleasant incidents were crowded into the last hour of the masquerade when a number of undesirables had arrived. The affair was over, so far as the committee and the representative element were concerned; it had been a splendid success and these little happenings took place too late to spoil the evening's fun.

Not Blows But Gayety at the St. Francis

Some malicious person started a rumor that on the occasion of the reception to Queen Vergilia at the St. Francis on Tuesday, Don Nicholas de Covarrubias in his character of Don Gaspar, cuffed Jonkheer Loudon, the minister of the Netherlands because that dignitary tried to take precedence of him. I do not believe the story and have been unable to trace it to anybody who claims to have seen the incident. It is unfair to our courtly Don Gaspar to impute such unpolished behavior to him. But I am going to tell you a story in which Don Gaspar appears as the central figure. It is the story of how the Portola festival actually started on Saturday, October 16, instead of on Tuesday, October 19. A crowd of good fellows was gathered in the St. Francis bar late that night. It included several attorneys, railroad and other professional men, some millionaires of local and eastern origin, a newspaperman or so and several Central American dignitaries, one of them closely related to President Cabrera of Guatemala. Don Nicholas and several wine agents completed the group. Although the hour had arrived when the bar usually closes, the fun was so fast and furious that the hotel people had not the heart to stop it. Musicians were brought in from another part of the caravansery and the volume of noise not being sufficient, an eastern millionaire swelled it by beating two empty cigar boxes together.

Don Nick Springs His Speech

To music succeeded oratory, for your vintage wines exercise a marvelously loosening influence on lips that are wont to be silent. One of the Central Americans astonished everybody by a remarkably incoherent and remarkably serious speech in which, on behalf of the whole of Latin America, he thanked San Francisco for her cordial reception. Rising to the occasion a gay young attorney whose firm name is known all over California and Nevada, replied on behalf of San Francisco with a brief address which was a masterpiece of mock-heroic banter. This was too much for Don Nicholas de Covarrubias. All week long he had been committing to memory a speech written for him by the dean of local newspaperdom which was to have been delivered for the first and last time at the opening of the festival on the Tuesday following. The worthy Don Gaspar simplycouldn't hold that speech within his bosom any longer and he arose, executed his most kingly bow and his most captivating smile and delivered his Portola speech. It was received with great laughter and applause and the Portola festival was thereupon solemnly inaugurated, three days in advance of schedule time.

When Don Nick Sulked

Don Nicholas was in a different humor on Wednesday night, the evening of the grand ball at the Fairmont, when I saw him in that same St. Francis bar. Achilles was sulking in his tent and everybody was seized with consternation. Don Nick had announced that he would not attend the ball at the Fairmont and every conceivable argument was being used by the committeemen to induce him to change his mind. It seems that through some oversight, no carriage had been provided for Don Nicholas and he got it into his head that he had been intentionally slighted. The situation looked exceedingly embarrassing for a long time during which Queen Vergilia had to wait, for of course it had been planned that she should enter the ballroom on the arm of Don Gaspar. Finally some of the newspapermen who have been very chummy with Don Nicholas since his arrival in town took him aside and put the matter in such a way that he decided that it would not be beneath his dignity to recede from his position.

No Enthusiasm Over the Mayor

If anything were needed to prove the rapidly waning popularity of Mayor Taylor, it was supplied one night during the display of fire works in Union Square. The square and all the streets about it were thronged with people who showed particular enthusiasm over the beautiful set pieces. One of Queen Vergilia brought forth roars of applause. Then followed one showing in lines of colored fire the counterpart presentment of Dr. Taylor with the legend, "Our Mayor" beneath. There was a dead silence throughout the throng. For the first time the chug-chug of automobiles and the clanging gongs of the cars were distinctly heard.

A Crepuscular Critic to Saltus

Having been one of those who took exception to the honors which have been lavished on Portola, not out of any lack of sympathy with the celebration of last week but solely on the score of historical unworthiness, I presume that I am included among the "crepuscular critics" at whom Edgar Saltus launched his withering scorn in the Examiner. If I must betake me to the obscurity of the twilight to which Saltus condemns all who differ from him, let me at least linger on the way to point out a mistake which none of the pedants, the "spectacled spiders of the bookshelves" would have been guilty of but which the correct and correcting Saltus has committed. Saltus compares Portola discovering the bay to Cortez discovering the Pacific. I am surprised at Saltus. I will consent to accept correction at his hands when he foregoes John Keats as an historical authority.

Our Festive Exiles

At the Portola banquet in New York Colvin Brown, according to the Sun, plumbed new depths in after dinner oratory. He said that the San Francisco girl's complexion was "like the pearl of an abalone shell." The Sun explains that as Brown's listeners were Californians he did not have to explain that "an abalone shell is not like the shell of a blue point for instance"; and the Sun adds, "This startling simile was accepted with the largeness of heart that Californians boast of as their distinctive possession." President McGowan of the Board of Aldermen, who was called upon to defend New York against the overwhelming claims of San Francisco, administered a few gentle reproaches. "You do so love San Francisco's products," he said, "that you give us imported wine to drink this evening; you do so love San Francisco that you come to live in New York." Of course the graft prosecution was touched upon. "We wash our dirty linen in public," said Colvin Brown, "but we don't erect a plaster of paris statue of liberty in the street while we're doing it." The New York Sun informs its readers that Portola is "the ancient Spanish gentleman adventurer who happened to stumble upon San Francisco Bay, and who is now made to shed his mothballs and become the patron saint of the rebuilt town by the Golden Gate."

A Celebrated Case

The Boughten Bulletin is visibly affected with the megrims as a result of the order from Washington directing the discontinuance of the prosecution of Dr. Edward B. Perrin who was indicted jointly with John A. Benson for conspiracy in land frauds. The freebooter of journalism in its undeflowered and unblemishable simplicity regards this order with suspicion, and intimates that Perrin exercised improper influence upon Attorney-General Wickersham. We are told, and it is true, that during the Roosevelt administration Attorney-General Bonaparte refused to order the prosecution of Perrin to stop; also, that "it is lucky for Perrin that his case outlasted the Roosevelt administration." Finally, we are informed that Perrin's escape "does not prove his innocence." Of course this last proposition is irrefutable. A jury found Perrin guilty, and no court has pronounced him innocent. But Perrin has said that his conviction was accomplished by means of perjured testimony, and from the action of Attorney-General Wickersham it is just to infer that after his investigation of the case he concluded that Perrin was the victim of the concienceless zeal of certain unscrupulous persons. Upon what evidence, or by what process of reasoning he reached this conclusion, I am unable to say. Nor have I sufficient information to warrant the assertion that the action of the Attorney-General reflects great discredit, if nothing worse, on one William J. Burns, the gumshoe artist who laid the foundation for the prosecution of the land fraud cases. All that can be said with any degree of certainty on this subject is that during the investigation of the Perrin prosecution Burns was under fire; that he was accused of influencing the Grand Jury that indicted Perrin by representing that President Roosevelt was in favor of his indictment; and that he also exercised a sinister influence over the principal witness who has since altered his testimony. But to be just to Burns it should be said that the charges against him have not been substantiated.

Older and Burns

That Detective Burns is not at all pleased with the action of the Attorney-General in the Perrin case I am led to infer from the Boughten Bulletin's strictures on Mr. Wickersham. The Bulletin's editorials are usually dictated by motives that are grounded in the personal interests of Mr. Fremont Older, an emotional gentleman, who is much enamored of the Graft Prosecution's chief spy, a circumstance that may seem to be somewhat singular since every friendship bespeaks a similitude of nature and manners. Between the average journalist and the average human bloodhound there is nothing in common, but Mr. Older is not an average journalist. The average journalist, even though he be devoid of the instincts to which the business of a professional spy is repellant, has done some of the illuminative reading that, Dr. Johnson tells us, maketh a full man, and he knows that both history and fiction teach that the qualities of a successful detective are identical with those of a successful crook. Balzac's most capable police officials were ex-galley slaves; Sejanus was the greatest criminal in the days of the Caesars; Jonathan Wilde was a successful thief because as Fielding tells us he was extremely ingenious in inventing designs, artful in contriving the means to accomplish his purposes, resolute in executing them and unrestrained by any of those weaknesses which are comprehended in one general term of Honesty. Now William J. Burns is reputed to be a successful detective, but he is nevertheless one of Mr. Older's most intimate friends. Mr. Older is bitterly resentful of every invidious imputation cast against this side-partner of Heney's, not merely because the reprobation of Burns is injurious to the graft prosecution but rather on the score of true friendship. Mr. Older's friendship is sincere and ardent, almost of consuming febrility—while it last; but it is surprisingly liable to extinction. The spoiled darling of caprice, his friendship is ephemeral; it gets out of breath rushing to its height, but for the present he and Burns are like two berries moulded on one stem. To impugn the conduct of Burns is to incur the enmity of the illustrious time-serving champion of the great moral uplift. Burns and Older are not merely professionally intimate; they are social cronies in the fullest sense of the term, from which fact one might argue to a shocking conclusion, for the Burns who is Mr. Older's intimate was Abe Ruef's sincerest admirer when the fallen boss was in Judge Dunne's private jail promising to be a good dog. Ruef was frequently the host of the whole Burns family. What strange bedfellows this graft prosecution has made!

He Was Benson's Partner

As I have said I do not know whether Attorney-General Wickersham's order dismissing the Perrin case reflects discredit or odium on William J. Burns. My suspicions in the matter are entirely due to the Boughten Bulletin's hot resentment, which always carries with it more or less of significance. As a matter of fact, as the Bulletin has truthfully asserted, the innocence of Perrin has not been established; nor has the guilt of Burns. Furthermore if the charges that have been made against Burns were proved it would not follow that Perrin was innocent. There is not the slightest doubt that Perrin entered into an illegal contract with John A. Benson for the fraudulent acquisition of timber land. Benson has been convicted of a crime committed under that contract. Perrin's defense is that he didn't know the law and that he guilelessly permitted himself to be used as a tool in a deal from which he was to derive considerable profit. Now aside from the inspiration of the Bulletin's attitude in this matter there is a phase of the case of far more interest to me than that which concerns the friends and admirers of Mr. Older's boon companion. I have in mind the part that has been played by that severely virtuous personage the Hon. Barclay Henley, whose sublime soul in perpetual revolt against the sinfulness of this world, is mirrored in an honest face that wears a solemn aspect eloquent of preoccupation with the mephitic odors of civic corruption.

Henley's Dual Attitude

By reason of the Perrin case Mr. Henley occupies a somewhat anomalous position in this city, the psychology of which is an interesting study. Mr. Henley is one of the Bulletin's most ardent sympathizers. He believes in the virtue of the whole Graft Prosecution from Spreckels the apostle of civic purity unto Gallagher the immunity bather. He is convinced of the righteousness of all the methods and designs by which the uplifters have sought to accomplish their purpose. He is indignant at the courts that have not given the prosecutors full swing, and that have dared to challenge the principle that the end justifies the means. He has publicly maligned the Chief Justice of the State for refusing to violate his conscience in deference to the whims of certain impeccable patriots. Thus briefly have I pictured Mr. Henley the vociferous reformer. Now let us look on another picture. The same Barclay Henley that has absolute confidence in William J. Burns and all his works in the capacity of evidence gatherer for the graft prosecution is the same Barclay Henley that made two trips to Washington at $1,000 per trip in the interest of Dr. Edward B. Perrin. It was this same Barclay Henley that pleaded for the dismissal of the Perrin case on the ground that his client was the victim of a "frame-up." Mr. Henley's client has asserted that he was badly treated both by Heney and Burns, and Mr. Henley's views apparently coincided with Perrin's, but Barclay Henley, the reformer, championing the cause of civic righteousness in San Francisco, has faith illimitable in the attorney and the zealous hawkshaw. So far as the graft prosecution is concerned Mr. Henley has a passionate intuition of the transfiguration of the men that contributed to the success of the prosecution in the Perrin case.

How He Got Perrin Off

How easy it is for Mr. Henley to adjust his viewpoint is evidenced not only by his change of attitude toward Detective Burns; further illustration is to be found in the antithesis of his sentiments with reference to the administration of justice. Agreeing with Mrs. Gerberding, a lawyer by instinct, in preference to agreeing with the lawyers by training and education of the Supreme Court, he thinks the members of that tribunal should be censured for pronouncing the indictment in the Schmitz case fatally defective. Justice he believes to have been outraged by our Supreme Court. Yet this same virtuous Mr. Henley has no unfavorable opinion of his own conduct in the Perrin case. A jury found Perrin guilty, and a court of appeal declared that he had a fair trial, and yet Mr. Henley went to Washington and used the political influence of the Perrin family, which is considerable in several Southern States, to induce the Attorney-General to take arbitrary action in favor of the wealthy land grabber and in defiance of the processes of law. But there cannot be anything wrong with Henley for he has the approval of Mrs. Gerberding.

His Hatchet Men

Some time ago there was formed for the transaction of business in the civil and criminal courts the law firm of Heney, Cobb and Dwyer. For the bludgeoning of his enemies in the criminal courts Mr. Rudolph Spreckels, according to his own testimony, has paid into the coffers of this firm the sum of $63,500, distributed as follows: to Mr. Dwyer $13,500; to Mr. Cobb (whose bill was $50,000) $26,500; to Mr. Heney $23,500. This firm is still engaged in the transaction of civil and criminal business, but no member of it has yet been retained in the civil litigation which Mr. Spreckels is conducting, and which calls for a wider knowledge of law than is usually displayed in the criminal courts. Members of the bar who have a sense of humor and keen powers of discernment regard the situation as somewhat amusing, and some of them have explained Mr. Spreckels' apparent neglect on the theory that he assigned the members of the firm of Heney, Cobb & Dwyer to the rough work of "hatchet men" in his Tong war. At the same time, they suggest, that the election of Mr. Heney to the office of district attorney would be of great benefit to Mr. Spreckels even in his civil litigation, for with that office in his hip pocket he would be able to wield considerable influence in the grand jury room and intimidate jurors in civil as well as in criminal cases. This fact, I hear, has been obtruding itself of late on the somewhat obtuse perceptive faculties of the Call's nominal proprietor.

Father—Let me see, John, how old are you now?

Father—Don't you think it about time to take your medical degree and start to work?
Son—Oh, no, father; people have so little confidence in young doctors.

Maeterlinck's Production of Macbeth

None of my San Francisco friends in Paris seem to have been among those present at the unique presentation of Macbeth made by Maurice Maeterlinck, the "Belgian Shakespeare" in the wonderful old abbey of St. Wandrille in Normandy which is now the summer home of the great writer and his wife, best known as Mlle. Georgette Leblanc of the Opera-Comique. Surely nobody who had the privilege of seeing that production will ever forget it for it is said to have been the most beautiful interpretation of any drama ever given. The whole abbey constituted the stage, the select group of spectators, principally Parisians who, by the way, paid an almost incredible sum for the privilege of being present, not staying in any one spot throughout the piece but moving about to follow the action of the tragedy. Mme. Maeterlinck herself portrayed Lady Macbeth and the company was carefully selected and laboriously rehearsed. The genesis of the production and the best description of its progress have been given by the temperamental wife of the great mystic herself. She has contrived to convey the atmosphere of the old abbey as well as the weird beauty of the scenes of the play in a manner of which her husband has no reason to be ashamed.

The Genesis of the Project

"Chance placed in my hands last summer, at Saint-Wandrille," writes Mme. Maeterlinck, "Victor Hugo's translation of Macbeth, a rough, but, it seems, a faithful translation. I read the play as I strolled through the cloisters, the ruins and the great deserted rooms; and, little by little, it appeared to me as though the images created in my mind by the great poet were living on every side of me. I shall never forget my emotions of that day. Between the pages of the little volume which I clasped in my hands slept a command. Suddenly, on this fair summer's day, it springs into existence, guides my footsteps, enlightens my will and obliges me to move from room to room, from the cloisters to the garden, from the terraces to the ruins, from the chapel to the refectory. I hurry along, following the scenes that shift before my mind's eye. Here is the spot in the park, wild, neglected, interspersed with heath and bracken, where the witches dance. Macbeth and Banquo will arrive over there, from across the plain; before we see them, we shall hear the sound of their voices and the neighing of their mounts; they will alight to question the bearded crones with the choppy fingers and the skinny lips; and, after the prophecy, they will draw closer, they will come so near the spectators as to be able to whisper their secret; and Macbeth, now alone, Macbeth, already caught in the toils of his ambition, will think his horrible dream aloud. But I cross the room from which I have just watched this first scene; and Lady Macbeth stands before me. She holds the letter of which she already knows the contents; she is lit up with joy; even now she is wholly obsessed by the idea which holds her and which will not leave her before the last moment has come. We saw the man debating, resisting and struggling, but in the weaker woman the thought encountered no obstacle. A sound of voices in the court within; spurs ring against the flagstones; and the hero enters. A trumpet sounds in the distance. It is the death-knell of the unhappy Duncan. We are now on the terrace of Saint-Wandrille, or rather on the terrace of Macbeth's castle of Inverness; for by this time the real performance has joined hands with my dream and the two are blended in my thought. Seen through the branches of the trees, torches strew stars in the forest; one guesses the presence of a cavalcade descending the hill-side. Lady Macbeth stands motionless on the threshold. And this wait, made tenfold as vivid by reality, becomes a formidable thing."

How Maeterlinck Translates

After Mme. Maeterlinck had communicated her idea to her husband and they had discovered that the project would be feasible, it was found that the Hugo translation of Macbeth would be inadequate. So Maeterlinck, continues his wife, "resolutely undertook to make a new translation, in which the rhythm, the lilt, the movement, the color, the accent and, above all, the scenic qualities of Shakespeare's text (hitherto neglected by all the translators) should be reproduced as faithfully as possible. Then began for me a delight which I never hoped for nor expected. It was the revelation of Shakespeare. Unacquainted with the English language, hitherto I had known the great poet only through his translators and I had often asked myself why the poets of all ages bowed before him as before the uncontested sovereign. Now destiny answered my question with a strange eloquence. Shakespeare was revealed to me in an unequaled fashion, more mysterious, more immense than if I had been reading him direct in the original text. We worked day by day in the marvelous peace of the forest of Saint-Wandrille. First, Maeterlinck reads a phrase, constructing it according to the French form. Then he repeats it, tearing away the French garb which did not suit it; and already it makes me start. It hardly appears, yet it appears, beyond the form, on the other side, as it were, of the word! And once again he repeats it, disjointing more and more the first sense that had presented itself. Then, above a heap of words that fall clattering like so many empty shells, the real thought of the poet looms enormous, immense, untranslatable, and stands before my eyes as it must have arisen in the mind that gave it birth, half-way between thought and shape, infinite because not yet expressed and bound in words."

Reality Wedded to Illusion

"For my humble part," writes the gifted woman in summarizing the impression made by the drama, "I can loudly admit that never until that evening had I felt so perfect a communion to exist between myself and those who listened to me. Certainly, the most absolute reality confined and facilitated our movements, magnified and restricted them by turns, but without ever hampering them; for its orders were necessarily logical. And are we to believe that this reality dispelled the illusion? Because the illusion had adopted a new form, was it therefore wiped out? I believe that it was all the stronger inasmuch as it was more cunning. At the theatre, it is there, before us, behind the curtain; it attacks us face to face; it has no secret left for all of us who expect it and admit it in advance. But now, suddenly, its frame has disappeared, no curtain can veil it or reveal it to our senses, it no longer has its fixed place; and for this very reason it is thought no longer to exist. What a mistake! It is everywhere, on the contrary; it attacks us so treacherously, from every side, that we are all steeped in it, players and audience alike. It has only lost the appearance which centuries of habit had lent to it; and we are powerless against it, because we do not know where it is. It possesses us, guides us, dominates us; it mingles with reality until we are driven to recognize that they are now not at all hostile and that a masterpiece can sometimes unite them. The performance of Macbeth at Saint-Wandrille has signed a treaty of peace between reality and illusion."

Gaynor on Hearst

The mayoralty contest in New York is supplying the lovers of scurrility with a lot of entertainment. Mr. Hearst is heaping personal abuse on his opponents with his accustomed enthusiasm, but he is far from having it all his own way. Judge Gaynor has been pouring hot shot into the newspaper publisher, and he has been getting his share of the plaudits of the groundlings. According to Gaynor Hearst is the biggest mountebank of the age. Pretending to be the friend of the people he exposes the swindles of plutocratic malefactors only when they fail to let him in on the ground floor. "Where was Hearst when Metropolitan street railway stock was boomed up to $265 a share?" asks Gaynor. "Was he exposing the swindle. No! Having got in on the ground floor he was probably down in Wall street getting out on the roof." After denouncing Hearst as a liar and a traitor to his friends Judge Gaynor said: "Hearst's newspaper suppressed the facts of the sugar weighing frauds. The only comment by Mr. Hearst on this poor and miserable fraud upon the public was that no trustee of the sugar company, no big man, was privy to the fraud or knew of its operation. No, of course not! The money stolen from the people by those frauds was equal to the sum required to pay a dividend of 6 per cent upon every share of sugar stock. Of course no one but ignorant dock wallopers knew of this fraud. Of course, Mr. Hearst said that none of the rich men knew of it, so of course they didn't. Yet I observe that a United States jury has indicted one Parsons for implication in those frauds. Of course the United States Grand Jury was misled, because Mr. Hearst has assured his readers that none of the important men of the sugar trust was guiltily cognizant of these miserable frauds, and Mr. Parsons is an important man. Important? Why, he is the father of the Parsons who has discreetly made a public statement to the effect that he utterly divorces his politics from the affairs of his father's business. He is the father of the man who objects to me because I received one of my nominations from a man said to be in control of one of the boroughs of the five boroughs which gave me my nomination. But, my friends, although Mr. Hearst has given a clean bill of moral health to the elder Parsons and thereby established a clean ancestry for the younger Parsons, if I were compelled today to select, as for his integrity, between the younger Parsons and the man in control of Tammany, restricted in my choice solely to the ground of relative integrity, it does not seem to me that my choice would go to the younger Mr. Parsons, despite the fact that Mr. Hearst is confident that the sugar frauds in no wise tainted any rich man associated with the sugar trust." (Yep! Wow-wow!)

Gaynor Indulges in Innuendo

One night at the Academy of Music Judge Gaynor invited his hearers to go and take a look at William R. Hearst and "to look at that face." "Not content with his own newspapers," said the candidate in reference to Mr. Hearst, "he has hired columns in other newspapers. And he advertises himself as though he were a patent medicine or a nostrum." At this point, according to the New York Sun, Judge Gaynor "repeated an inelegant statement which he had made before while speaking on the subject of Mr. Hearst and his campaign. He intimated that the whole subject had an unpleasant, nauseating effect on his stomach." We are also told that Gaynor, referring to the fact that the private lives of candidates had been dragged into the campaign, "shot in another innuendo against the independent candidate "with reference to the appearance of his name on the ticket under the Goddess of Justice"; furthermore that "he made a veiled reference to a supporter of Hearst's campaign," a man "whose name he felt to be too obvious to mention." He said that Hearst "threw himself into the arms of this man." From all of which it is evident that the great apostle of yellow journalism is getting some pretty nasty doses of his own medicine. The game of politics is assuredly being played pretty low down in the great metropolis. Perhaps never before in this country was it characterized by such disgusting personalities as are being exchanged between Gaynor and Hearst.

Hearst Retorts

From the Sun I also learn that Mr. Hearst is making a whirlwind campaign which has something of the hurrah spirit of 1905. The night after Gaynor made his scurrilous assault on him Hearst addressed four meetings, and, according to the Sun, "it took a strong arm to rip a way into any of the halls after 8 o'clock. He first appeared at the Yorkville Casino. William De Ford was telling some 1,800 extremely enthusiastic folk that Judge Gaynor had been talking entirely through his hat. Up in the gallery they saw Hearst boring a way toward the stage with the assistance of half a dozen panting policemen and it was all off with De Ford's speech. The crowd got up and yelled for five minutes with the able assistance of a band that switched from "The Star Spangled Banner" into "Die Wacht am Rhein" so fast that the bass drummer gave up in despair trying to follow the music and just swatted away manfully. Mr. Hearst told the audience that he merely felt sorry for a certain fussy old gentleman who had become ill natured, vituperative and a little vulgar. He said he had been disposed at first to feel bitter toward the Judge, but that he realized that evil communications had indeed corrupted good manners. There was a time, said Mr. Hearst mournfully, when Judge Gaynor was really a nice old fellow from whom much was expected. But Mr. Gaynor! He couldn't stand for Mr. Gaynor. The audience broke into deafening applause.

"I see from the despatches that Chauncey Depew now approves of Mr. Hearst."

"Poor Chauncey! he hasn't had the courage to disapprove of anything since the insurance scandal."

Poet of Zionism and Vagabondia Dead

How many of our litterateurs and esthetes have marked the passing of Naphtali Herz Imber, true poet? How many of them have ever heard of him? Those who are fond of imagining that the lot of the modern singer is sweeter and easier than it was of yore should ponder the miserable life and lonely death of this remarkable man who wrote the Marseillaise of Judah's restoration known to all Zionists as the "Hatikwoh" or Hymn of Hope and who was portrayed in Zangwill's "Children of the Ghetto" under the name of Melchitsedek Pinchas. A romantic wanderer through many lands, generally miserably poor, the prey of disease and an outcast among his people, this strange creature composed the song which has fired thousands of Jewish hearts in Zionist convention assembled while its unhappy author hovered outside to catch its strains and perhaps to surprise a look of appreciation from somebody who recognized him as the source of that beautiful inspiration. When Imber died a few days ago he left the following curious will in which the bitter humor of his nature and the cynical indifference of his attitude toward life and men were epitomized: "To the rabbis I leave what I don't know; it will help them to a longer life. To my enemies I leave my rheumatism. Between the Republican and the Democratic parties I divide the boodle they have not yet touched. To the Jewish editors I leave my broken pen so that they can write slowly and avoid mistakes. As an executor there shall be appointed a man who knows Barnum's philosophy through and through. Written on my deathbed. Witness, Mr. Pluto, of the Underground, and his Famulus, the Doctor. As an afterthought I leave to my publishers the last bill unpaid by me. They can frame it and keep it as an amulet to ward away that class of authors." As soon as he had breathed his last Zionists who had neglected him in life were disputing for the honor of burying him.

A Sweet Singer of Israel

To Zionists Imber is best known for the great hymn already mentioned; the general reader may place him as the author of the stirring "Watch on the Jordan" translated and published in his Ghetto volume by Zangwill. Imber wrote his poetry in Hebrew and his prose in English. He was a ready writer when the inspiration was upon him. Once in St. Louis while he was lying on the operating table of a hospital, ready to undergo a dangerous operation, he called for pen and paper and composed his "Confession" which he regarded as his finest poem. He was not liked by the orthodox rabbis, although Rabbi Hirsch was one of his benefactors. His views were radical, his pen free and he found his inspiration often in women and wine. A Francois Villon of the Ghetto, he gloried in a wanderlust which carried him to every clime; yet he never seemed to have money and he got little for his poems. Once he went about the country asserting that he was a mahatma, a "wise man of the Indies." He not only had a dark skin, but the tan of the tramp, and he let his black hair grow long, so that he looked like a real Hindu philosopher. As a mahatma, for several years he traveled about enjoying himself, incidentally delivering lectures on Buddhist and Hindu philosophy—lectures consisting of incomprehensible, vague, and ecstatic outpourings, which the Hebrew mahatma did not himself understand. One of his works was an essay on "Traces of Fire Worship in Ancient Judaism." If he had one surpassing love it was Palestine. He was taken to Palestine by Lawrence Oliphant in 1879 but was afterwards expelled from the country by the Turkish Government because he wrote the revolutionary "Watch on the Jordan." "I never would have left that country otherwise," he declared, "because I loved it so well." He often declared that he was a believer in Zionism but not in Zionists; at the last Zionist banquet in New York he made his way into the hall when contributions were being made and advanced to the front with a grandiose flourish, crying: "Imber gives a nickel." Eccentric, a poseur, Imber hid the true poetic inspiration beneath his wretchedness; his work will live to be his best memorial when his weaknesses are forgotten, but if he needed an epitaph Stendhal's might be applied to him: "He loved much and wrote much, therefore much should be forgiven him."

UNION LABOR NOMINEE

Public Administrator

An Erring Minister

We think that we are having all the trouble there is in the world right here in San Francisco—that the division of our town into factions is about the most serious thing that is happening anywhere. But to one who reads many papers the fallacy of this is apparent and likewise the truth of Gilbert Chesterton's epigram, "For every little town that is, God made the stars to shine especially." Clear over on the other side of the world there is a little community all ripped to pieces as a result of a bitter controversy over a preacher's prayers. Peniston, near Newcastle-on-Tyne, is the place, Canon Turnbull is the preacher. From a Newcastle paper I learn that Canon Turnbull plays favorites in his prayers. When praying for the royal family he prays for Victoria dead and turning to clay instead of for Edward who is very much alive and in need of salvation. Sometimes he omits the name of the sovereign altogether. Just about as reprehensible is his occasional prayer for Parliament when Parliament is not in session. When rebuked for this offense the miscreant said, "Well, you know I do not read the papers, anyway." It is not the seriousness of the vicar's offense but their own argument over it that has brought about the trouble among the good people of Peniston. Some maintain that an occasional prayer for the late monarch can do no harm and might do some good, while others contend that the present ruler of England is in need of all the supplications that can be uttered in his behalf. Then they argue hotly about Parliament. That body, some say, needs all the prayers it can get, whether in or out of session, while others quibble over the technicality that when there is no session there is, perforce, no Parliament. It is as strenuously held by others that the mere fact of a meeting does not make a Parliament—that Parliament is an institution that exists both in the abstract and concrete, and that the one form needs praying for as much as the other. As to failing to read the papers, the Canon has all the editors lined up against him for that, while the old-fashioned folk who resent the tinge of saffron that is creeping into British journalism rally to his support. Really it is an amusing mixup, and it is not without its pathetic side. It is of no particular interest to us, except that it shows us that we have not cornered all the wickedness in the world. Peniston, as I have shown you, has an arch criminal, one who jeopardizes his own soul and shocks the sensibilities of his parishioners by his unholy discrimination. Really, he is a subject for a grand jury.

The nomination of Mr. Kelleher by the Union Labor party for the important and responsible position of Public Administrator was a merited endorsement of his record in all its phases of activity. Mr. Kelleher is a member of the well known tailoring firm of Kelleher and Browne, 11 Seventh street. As a merchant Mr. Kelleher ranks high in the commercial world of San Francisco. He has always taken a lively interest in the municipal and commercial affairs of our city and is ever ready to assist in the furtherance of every wise civic improvement. Mr. Kelleher has built up his fine business by sheer energy and ability, and despite strong opposition. For a good many years Mr. Kelleher has given his services willingly and without charge to every worthy movement here or elsewhere. No charge has ever been exacted by him, and this generous spirit has won legions of friends for him. He has demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt that he is capable of successfully conducting great enterprises, and therefore can be relied on to perform the duties of Public Administrator in a manner that will reflect credit on himself and give satisfaction to all the citizens of San Francisco.

LARGESS

Go forth in life, O friend, not seeking love—
A mendicant that with imploring eye
And outstretched hand asks of the passer-by
The alms his strong necessities may move.
For such poor love, to pity near allied,
Thy generous spirit may not stoop and wait,
A suppliant whose prayer may be denied,
Like a spurned beggar's at a palace gate;
But thy heart's affluence lavish, uncontrolled;
The largess of thy love give full and free,
As monarchs in their progress scatter gold;
And be thy heart like the exhaustless sea,
That must its wealth of cloud and dew bestow,
Though tributary streams or ebb or flow!

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy.

Stocks: The decline in stocks in the past week has been the result of the international monetary trouble in Europe which has affected our market here by considerable liquidation of securities from that center. Over speculation in German industrials has necessitated the check by the Imperial Bank of Germany raising its discount rate to five per cent. This was followed by the Bank of England raising its rate to five per cent to hold its gold reserve intact. The matter is looked on by foreign bankers as not productive of serious results. On the contrary, an adjustment of the money situation is expected in the next few weeks or sooner, when normal conditions will prevail. Meantime it is not unlikely that considerable outflow of the yellow metal may occur in accordance with the rate of foreign exchange which is practically at the gold exporting point. Hence we find in the foregoing a sufficient check to speculation in our own securities and the chances favoring some further liquidation in stocks. Fundamental conditions of trade could not be better, and every indication points to industrial activity. We may say the security market has discounted in many instances such a favorable condition in industry; as at this period of the year, when money rates harden, it is not unnatural to see a cleansing of the speculative position in Wall street.

Grain: Cash premiums for wheat gave the market another lift. The country grain dealers and millers have been the big bull element looking to the futures to compensate them if the present cash prices hold. A long headed speculative crowd anticipating a repetition of July and September have been loading up on December. The price has gone over May and made the shorts uneasy. However the immediate outlook is not altogether clear, for the price has brought out a lot of wheat the past week. Receipts at the primary markets were 2,500,000 bushels over the same week last year, the first week to show a heavy gain this season. It is well to watch the receipts, for a continuation of the present volume will force a lot of selling by the country bulls, especially if premiums disappear. Number 1 northern and Chicago is just even with the market and this is contract. Duluth has shipped moderately to Chicago. The winter wheat premiums remain and they will check a heavy decline should receipts continue. While the theory of a shortage in the grain is tenable, it is based on movements to date, and as liable to fall before facts as to be sustained. Trading should be conservative at this level and this situation and quick turn in position may be required. The consumption of the new wheat is only normal and the difference in the visible only equals the shortage of receipts to date. The long view is still bullish and we are approaching a period when winter wheat millers will be forced to use considerable shipping wheat to supply regular trade. We are completely out of touch with Europe and trading on an apparently domestic basis, hence world movements are without influence. The price is simply a question of receipts from this time on.

Corn holds to its high level and the short interest is large. There has been little development in corn; farmers holding above Chicago parity. A spell of wet damp weather, now developing south of the lakes, will defer deliveries and shipment and a run in of shorts will take place if it makes good. The south is a big buyer of corn and oats and has been held back from a broad purchasing by the expectation of lower prices. There is more short corn at Chicago than will be delivered by the farmers between now and the year's end.

Cotton: A wave of outside speculation has come into the market during the past week and carried prices into new high ground, January selling at 14.22, March at 14.29, May at 14.33 and October at 14 cents while spots were quoted at 14.40, just 40 points above the price of October contracts which will mature in 5 days. The third of a series of 10 reports was made public on Monday morning at the opening by the U. S. Census Bureau and served to establish more conclusively the claims of the bulls for a very short crop. It is probable that a greater percentage of the crop has already been ginned than to the corresponding date in any previous year. The largest percentage of a crop ginned to October 18 was 53.7 in 1902, a year like the present, the October condition of 1902 having been 58.3 against 58.5 this year. Therefore, it is safe to say that at least 55 per cent of the total crop has been ginned and on this basis the indicated crop is about 10,000,000 bales or about in keeping with our estimate. Mr. Ellison, the English authority on consumption, estimates this year's requirements of America at 235,000 bales less than last year or 12,625,000 bales against 12,860,000. If the loss in weight be considered, about two per cent, it will be seen that it would take more American bales this year than were used last year, or about 12,890,000. To get the cotton will be another question; it will be impossible unless spinners eat up all their invisible reserves. Of foreign growth, Mr. Ellison estimates that the world will consume 2,650,000 bales against 2,109,000 bales or 541,000 bales more than last year. Total requirements of all kinds have been estimated at 15,275,000 against 14,969,000 last year, or 306,000 larger, which we consider very bullish and the price will simply have to advance to such a high figure that consumption will be restricted. We should have 15 cent cotton by November 15, 18 cents by Christmas and possibly 20 cents afterwards.

tended to take the edge off trading in local securities and, in consequence, business was rather small with very few price-changes. The real feature of the recent local trade is the resumption of activity in Hawaiian Sugar stocks. Advances have been made in Honokaa, Hutchinson, Makaweli and Paauhau, while Hawaiian Commercial and Onomea have remained rather steady. The strength of the New York raw sugar market together with the bright outlook down at the islands are helping the sugar group. Associated Oil has also been an active trader and, as predicted in last week's review, has had an advance. I understand that dividends on this stock are not hoped for, for some time yet, and in that case, the Oil Company's recent contract with Japan is causing the advance. Alaska Packers has had some little setback but I feel that its position is becoming stronger by reason of this selling and as the buying orders on the stock come from authoritative sources, it should soon recover. Fireman's Fund Insurance stock has had a nice rise to $201, the highest price it has brought since the fire of 1906. I hear that this company's earnings are increasing at an encouraging rate which will soon show up in the form of increased dividends. Those of our stocks which have the largest call in New York, Telephone and Pacific Gas stocks, have been very quiet lately. There is nothing of alarm in this neglect as I feel that the monetary situation both in New York and abroad is causing the easterners to devote their attention to their own securities and they have put our California stocks temporarily on the shelf. The local bond market has been a trifle dull but the general firmness of the bond list, during the quiet period, is an interesting feature. For the future, I feel that the leading California stocks are purchases on any setbacks or even at present prices as no one can deny that our offerings have much merit and where that is the case, nothing but a bright future can be looked for.

A Bird's Revenge

By J. M. Hammond

Do birds think?

I have heard this question often asked by people who make a study of the habits of birds. Some time since, there stood in front of the house where I lived and not more than thirty feet from the porch, two soft maple trees; one on the right and one on the left of the board walk, running to the street walk. The one on the right was large with long limbs trimmed almost bare, for much of their length. The other was a smaller tree, with dense foliage, so thick that the eye could penetrate it only here and there. In this dense thicket of leaves, a number of English sparrows had built their nests of strings, grass, feathers and everything else these industrious and much hated birds could carry, and from which they kept up an almost incessant and rasping chirrup. At an early hour one morning while sitting on my porch, reading the morning paper, my attention was attracted by the appearance of a large blue-jay, who, in all of his pride of feathers and person perched himself on one of the bare limbs of the larger maple and began arranging his morning toilet. He was discovered by the irrepressible sparrows and they seemed to organize themselves for an attack. First, one sparrow would fly swiftly past the blue-jay, followed by another and another and so on in quick succession, each nipping or pulling at the pretty blue feather dress of the blue-jay, and so persistent and energetic was their attack, that sometimes they would pull the blue-jay from the limb.

This proceeding lasted, not to exceed three minutes, when the blue-jay straightened himself up on the limb and, like a flash, darted into the maple where the sparrows had their nests and for about a minute, amid the painful shrieks and chirrups of the sparrows, the blue-jay scattered the strings, feathers, grass and sticks in every direction until the nests of the sparrows were in ruins. When the blue-jay had finished his work of destruction he flew back to his former perch on the maple and began to make his toilet of blue undisturbed. Was this revenge?

Is Young Spreckels Engaged?

A great deal of curiosity was aroused at Mackenzie Gordon's musicale last Sunday evening on account of the presence of Miss Mary Adele Case, the young lady of Oregon City with whose name that of Claus A. Spreckels Jr. has been so persistently linked by the bavardes of two continents. Those who saw Miss Case for the first time pronounced her a very attractive young woman; but they were rather puzzled by her attitude toward the newspaper rumors of her engagement to the grandson of our sugar king. Miss Case, I am told, did not endeavor in any way to discourage the gossip about her engagement; in fact, it seems that she rather gave it added impetus by her oblique references to the subject. The presence of the young lady in this city has greatly upset John D. Spreckels who has been doing everything in his power to shatter his son's romance. One of the latest stories to disturb him was that of an offer made to Miss Case by a Chicago vaudeville manager who was willing to pay her $1,000 a week if she would accept an engagement as a vocalist. Of course the fact that her name has been conjoined to that of the promising scion of the house of Spreckels would make her a drawing card in the windy city. Everybody is waiting on the tiptoe of expectation to see how Miss Case and young Spreckels will act when design or fortuitous circumstance brings them together here.

Miss Case to Sing Here

Miss Case is a contralto and will be soon heard in concert here. She comes from quite humble origin and by hard work, some of it even manual, has climbed to a fine position in the world of music. For some time she has been contralto soloist at the American Church in Paris and it was while officiating in this capacity that she met young Spreckels who fell violently in love with her and followed her to this country in the hope of inducing the fair singer to become his wife. Miss Case will keep on with her musical work and it is predicted that within a very few years her name will be enrolled among the world's greatest contraltos. Her voice is said to possess a sympathetic quality that reaches right into the hearts of her auditors.

Villolabar Studies Society Manners

If one cared to indulge in any unkind reflections, one might relate the story of the frosty fiasco which society made of its sole and only attempt at maintaining the city's reputation for hospitality during the recent festivities. I refer, of course, to the reception on Monday night to His Excellency, Marquis Villolabar, minister from Spain at Washington. This was to have been a society affair and all of the "exclusives" were duly invited. A splendid musical program had been prepared by Senor Wanrell and the Spanish Choral Society which had been rehearsing for weeks. Music had been sent from Madrid and everything was to be in accordance with the rank of the guest of honor. One regrets to admit that this was the one and only failure of the entire Portola program. Society which had been "bored to death," as the sacrosanct ones insisted upon informing us, dawdled in when the reception was half over and gossiped its small talk during the concert; then observing that the ball room of the St. Francis was by no means filled, society suspected that the affair was not one patronized by "our set" and dawdled out again into the corridors to chat and display its costumes. So dismal was the reception that Marquis Villolabar, during a good-natured chat with one of his countrymen, remarked that he had no idea that San Franciscans had such an antipathy towards the Spanish—that being his deduction. The singers, disgusted with the indifference of the listeners, gave but half of the program. Of course there were a number of splendid exceptions to the bad manners displayed by the majority. Gertrude Atherton, for instance, as well as the de Young girls and Mrs. de Young, seemed to be really enjoying the concert. The charming Miss Maud Fay who came with Thornwell Mullaly gave deference where honor was due, but her splendid conduct naturally could not make up for the rudeness of the rest.

The Astor Divorce

Newport society is once more preoccupied with the details of a divorce scandal. This time the persons involved are of the very head and front of the so-called smart set. Mrs. John Jacob Astor, the complainant, is the most influential woman in the aristocracy of Newport and Gotham. She is the acknowledged leader of the 400 that was organized by the late Ward McAllister. Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish, the females of the Mills family and the lesser lights of the plutocracy are her satellites. No one is regarded as of the inner circle of New York society who has not been admitted to the Holy of Holies presided over by Mrs. Astor. The Astor ball is always the premier event of the season. It was Mrs. Astor that supplied editorial writers throughout the country with a pregnant topic of discussion some years ago, when, for the purpose of effacing the widespread impression that the key to New York society was of pure gold, she made the announcement that no man was a gentleman who had not received a college education. At one time Mrs. Astor closed the portals of society against divorced persons, but she assumed a different attitude toward delinquents after Mrs. J. Coleman Drayton figured in a salacious intrigue with Hallet Alsop Burrowe which developed into a scandal of international proportions, to which a romantic tinge was imparted by a bloody duel. Mrs. Astor's change of attitude was due to the circumstance that Mrs. Drayton was a daughter of the house of Astor. The rehabilitation of Mrs. Drayton was personally conducted by the New York society leader. The process began in England with the approval of Albert Edward who gave the lady social recognition after she became the wife of Ogilvie Haig. A little later the King's old chum, Lily Langtry, came to this country and was given social recognition at a charity ball by the exclusive Mrs. Astor. Thereupon it was surmised that in thus giving notice to the smart set that the notorious actress was not to be considered beyond the pale she was carrying out a bargain with the King made in the interest of Mrs. Ogilvie Haig.

MISS ELSIE DE WOLFE

MISS JENNIE LEE

They Fled From the Portola

The Edward Schmiedells, the Albert Dibblees and Wharton Thurston, who were among those who took to the woods during Portola week, had a rather dismal time of it on their trip to Tahoe to the Schmiedell cottage. They encountered deep snow drifts on the way, but even that was considered nothing compared to the alternative of having to participate in the Portola frolickings. Mrs. William Tevis who arrived with the four boys from New York on Monday, whisked her family away on the eve of the town's rejoicing at its rebuilding, and even Dr. Harry Tevis, usually included among the public-spirited ones, hied himself away to New York on the day of the festival's opening. Ever so many other society people betook themselves to distant places, far from the noisy crowd's hilarity, and still, odd to relate, the fiesta was a great success, including even the ball at the Fairmont which the "Smart Set," with vehement indignation, asserted it would not attend. Everyone with an observing eye voted Mrs. Henry T. Scott the handsomest of the matrons in local society at the ball. She certainly looked the regal grande dame in her frock of pale violet satin with its handsome embroidery of violet and steel beads. Few women dress with as much taste as Mrs. Scott. Another much-admired matron at the ball was Princess David Kowanan-akoa who was holding court all evening, the officers flitting about the dark-eyed beauty even to the exclusion of the younger girls. The princess wore a white satin with an overdress of pearls and rose point, with strands of pearls about her throat. "Princess David" as she is known among her friends, was much feted in

Our Own Navy Was Forgotten

Everybody is wondering how it happened that no invitations for the Portola ball at the Fairmont were sent to the officers of the United States navy until within a few hours of the affair. The foreign officials, naval and others, all received their cards in plenty of time but the Americans were completely overlooked. The strange circumstance was called to the attention of the committee late in the afternoon. Messengers were immediately dispatched in every direction with the belated invitations and they succeeded in reaching all the officers who had been ignored, forgotten or what you will. Naturally they were very indignant and averse from going but better counsel prevailed and most of them put in an appearance. But there has been an infinite deal of talking about the blunder of the committee.

Greenway List Rigorously Censored

The Greenway dances are to undergo a rigorous sifting, the lists having been reduced to just two hundred and forty, no more and no less. The fiat is issued by absolute command, coming from Burlingame, and there is therefore no appeal to any higher majesty. What wailing and bitter heartache this will occasion no one knows but those swept into the outer darkness, far from the scintillating glimmer of the lights that will shine upon the bejeweled backs of the dancers at the newly organized cotillon. That the dances are to be of crystalline fineness may be judged from the fact that the patroness list includes Miss Jennie Crocker, Mrs. Joseph D. Grant, Mrs. George A. Pope, Mrs. Herbert Moffitt, Mrs. Frederick McNear, Mrs. Alexander Hamilton, Mrs. Walter S. Martin, Mrs. Horace Pillsbury, Mrs. Latham McMullin, Mrs. James A. Folger, Mrs. Edward Pringle, Mrs. George Almer Newhall, Mrs. William H. Taylor, Mrs. Henry T. Scott, and Mrs. Laurance Scott. Each sponsor has subscribed the sum of one hundred dollars and will be allowed the privilege of inviting ten of her friends. As there are to be twenty-four patronesses in all when the list is completed, the final selections will eliminate a great part of Greenway's list which formerly included some six hundred.

The Alexander-Swift Feud Still On

I am informed that the ill-feeling existing between Mrs. Alexander and Mrs. John F. Swift has become so intensified by a recent incident that the two ladies are now deemed irreconcilable. You remember, of course, the storm which stirred society when it became known that Mrs. Alexander had refused Mrs. Swift a card to the Colonial dances. As Mrs. Swift occupies a commanding position among the older families of the city, Mrs. Alexander's action bred wide-spread enmities which still endure. This year Mrs. Alexander sent cards for the Colonial balls to Mrs. Swift and her sister Mrs. Norris. The astonishment of those ladies may be imagined when they read her letter, requesting them to join the dancing club. The olive branch was not accepted; the letter was tossed into the waste basket and still remains unanswered. Naturally both of the feudists are more embittered than ever and everybody is wondering just how far the influence of their quarrel will extend.

Mrs. Lloyd Osborne Angry

The bad feeling which has been known to exists for a long time between Mrs. Lloyd Osborne and Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson has at last become so much a thing of public property that he who runs past the queer old Osborne-Stevenson home on Russian hill may read all about it. Mrs. Osborne has posted a notice on her house announcing that it is not a convent and furthermore, that it never was the property of Robert Louis Stevenson and that he spent elsewhere the years during which he is supposed to have resided there. The Osborne and Stevenson homes are in one building, the Stevenson half of which has passed, through the generosity of Frank J. Sullivan, to the Carmelite nuns. Evidently Mrs. Osborne objects to having her half of the property mistaken for that which formerly belonged to her mother-in-law. I hear also that Mrs. Osborne is furious at Frank Sullivan, first of all because he was the means of installing the convent next door and also because some of the alterations made for the nuns have interfered with her light.

Not an Engagement Tea

The majority of those invited fully expect that at the large and elaborate tea which Mrs. George Wilcutt will give on November 6 at the St. Francis in honor of Miss Olney, the engagement of that attractive young lady to young George Wilcutt will be announced. However from no less a person that Mrs. Wilcutt herself I learn that there is not a word of truth in this story. The Wilcutt and Olney families have been intimate friends for years and the tea is simply a pretty compliment to a charming young girl who will be one of the debutantes of the season.

Miss Baker Returns a Beauty

The return of Miss Dorothy Baker after a year in Europe with her aunt, Miss Kate Stone, is creating a genuine furore of excitement among the belles who are wondering how on earth such a marvelous transformation was wrought, for Miss Dorothy, who went away a not particularly pretty girl, returns as a positive beauty. Her complexion is of a rose-petal pinkness, clear as pearls and her big brown eyes are radiant with the sparkle of perfect health. Now all the girls are wondering where Miss Baker found this enchanting fountain of beauty. Certainly should Miss Stone care to act as chaperon for any of the other belles, and there are several whose season of two has resulted in listlessness and faded coloring, she could easily find any number of rich daughters willing to accompany her to Europe. Miss Baker returns with a mountain of trunks, full of the most bewitching gowns, so everyone is very keen about her forthcoming debut.

The Tobin Luncheon For Miss de Sabla

Quite the most elaborate as well as the daintiest of the semi-informal affairs that have been given to herald the debut of the season's buds was Mrs. Clement Tobin's luncheon this week at the Fairmont, to which Mrs. Tobin invited a few of her friends and the buds of last winter to meet Miss Vera de Sabla. Mrs. Tobin who is lissome and exquisitely fair with a cream and pink complexion, has the reputation in Paris and the fashionable Alpine resorts, of being the most beautiful of all the much-lauded women who annually go abroad to emphasize the fame of Californiennes. One of the fashionable foreign journals recently lauded her artistic taste in gowning herself, and certainly the dresses which she brought back a month or so ago, and with which she is delighting her friends, are proof that the praise was not unmerited. Miss Vera de Sabla resembles her handsome sister as a rose bud resembles the perfect rose. She is very shy, an unusual trait for a California girl, but as she is convent-educated, her reserve is most attractive. At the luncheon this week Mrs. Tobin looked unusually handsome in a gown of black silk cachemere, the skirt draped in true washerwoman style, while the bodice was a close-fitting affair of gold net embroidered in blue iris blossoms. The dainty Miss Vera wore a girlish-looking blue printed foulard, made short of skirt, quite full, with a tunic, and the bodice was draped in fichu style, with Irish lace trimmings.

Consuelo Complained to King Edward

One of my gossipy friends who is enjoying the delights of London writes me that a great deal of talk centers about the social difficulties which the American Duchess of Marlborough who was Consuelo Vanderbilt has experienced since her separation from her ducal consort. It seems that the latest development came in no less formidable shape than a protest addressed by the duchess to the king himself on account of the slight which has been administered to her rank by the functionaries of the court and the officers of the most exclusive order in Europe. The duchess, it seems, did not receive an invitation to attend the investiture of King Manuel of Portugal as a Knight of the Garter at Windsor Castle. To such a ceremony, the most courtly and exclusive necessarily, the wives of those who wear the Garter are always bidden. Etiquette directs even the splendid robes the women must wear on the occasion. The Duke of Marlborough is a Knight of the Garter. The members of that order consist only of the Sovereign of England and twenty-five knight companions, most of whom are reigning sovereigns or heirs-presumptive. The only woman who is a member is the Queen of England, the Duchess of Marlborough's dear friend, and the only wife of a Knight of the Garter who was not invited to the investure of Portugal's young King is the American born Duchess of Marlborough. Her friends say truly that her social position cannot be affected by her absence from Court. But they insist that it is perfectly conceivable that she should resent any implied slight or injustice put upon her. The Duke of Marlborough received an invitation to King Manuel's investiture as a matter of course. It is worthy of note that this is the first Court function to which he has been bidden since he and his wife separated.

Religious Mary Garden

I do not know whether the great singer Mary Garden is consciously taking George Moore's Evelyn Innes as the model of her operatic career, but I was struck by certain close resemblances between the experiences of the fictive and live singers at the time that Miss Garden's quarrel with her patroness disclosed some of the incidents of her early life in Paris. And now Miss Garden offers herself once more in a role which irresistibly suggests Moore's heroine. Miss Garden says that she is going to take the veil; yet, lest any music-lover be inclined to melancholy over the prospective loss to the stage of a fine singing voice, let me hasten to explain that Miss Garden places the time of her entrance into conventual gloom far away in the dim and mysterious future. Miss Garden is quoted as saying: "I am spending all my spare time studying for the Roman Catholic religion, so as to fit myself for a nun. I am tired of the pomp and vanity of this wicked world, and when my operatic career closes I shall retire to a convent and live, in poverty and humility, the higher life." That Miss Garden should defer her retirement to the life of a Sister Teresa until the distant date when her operatic career has closed, reassures those of us who are anxious to have her remain upon the stage long enough to give us an opportunity to hear her. Miss Garden is still young and the impulse toward the higher life of poverty and

In the Social Spotlight

Mrs. Robert Findley Monteagle is on her way home from abroad, having arrived recently in New York. Among other things she is bringing back a handsome French touring car. Mrs. Monteagle lately inherited an immense fortune from an uncle who died several months ago in the east. She was formerly Miss Daisy Paige, daughter of the late T. Paige, a well known resident of this city.

Gertrude Atherton will leave during the first week of November for the east.

Invitations have been issued for a large tea that Mrs. William Boericke and her pretty twin daughters, the Misses Ruth and Dorothy, will give at their home in Washington street on November 6.

The death of Mrs. Mary Jewett, wife of John H. Jewett, the well known banker of Marysville, which occurred at Oak Ridge near Kenwood on October 23 was a great shock to their many friends. Mrs. Jewett was formerly Miss Mary Burtis, a sister of Mrs. Thornburg and came of an old and well known pioneer family.

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Lilly of San Rafael have taken the Bermingham house in Pierce street for the winter.

Mrs. T. Z. Blakeman left last Saturday for St. Louis. Later she will visit Fort Hamilton where she will be the guest of her daughter, Mrs. Robert McMillan, wife of Captain McMillan of the Artillery corps. Mrs. McMillan was formerly Leontine Blakeman of this city. I'm told the stork is hovering over her household.

Mrs. W. G. Brokaw of New York City and maid spent some time at Del Monte before taking apartments at the Fairmont for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. George H. Lent, Bessie Hooker and Jennie Hooker will arrive within a few days from their tour abroad.

Mrs. Robert N. Graves will return this week to her home in Sacramento street after passing the last five months at Edge Hill, Napa county, the handsome summer home of Mrs. Dichman.

Mrs. Holden and her daughters, the Misses Holden, gave a tea recently in honor of Mrs. Charles Stockton Pope, formerly Miss Marian Holden, who is visiting here from Los Angeles.

Mrs. Starr Keeler of San Rafael will give a children's Hallowe'en party tonight at her home.

Mrs. Henry James Morton was hostess at a bridge party on Thursday at her handsome home in Pacific avenue.

Paul C. Jones entertained Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Thompson and Miss Buffington at dinner Monday night at The Tavern of Tamalpais.

Late letters from Mrs. E. Walton Hedges announce her arrival in Paris where she is comfortably settled for the winter. Mrs. Hedges is perfecting herself in German and Italian and taking lessons from a celebrated vocal instructor.

Mr. and Mrs. Truxton Beale entertained Mr. and Mrs. Frank Lowdan at luncheon Saturday at The Tavern of Tamalpais. After luncheon the party visited Muir Woods.

Mrs. Maud Dunsmuir gave a delightful musicale this week at the residence of her mother, Mrs. Shoobert, in Sausalito. She was assisted by Mrs. Thomas Claussen. About thirty people were present.

Mrs. A. E. Kent and Mrs. Crane spent Saturday at the Tavern.

Late news from Miss Marian Miller reports that she is rapidly recovering from her recent severe illness and will leave Paris on October 22, arriving here about November 15, accompanied by her parents, Mr. and Mrs. C. O. G. Miller.

San Francisco arrivals at Hotel del Coronado recently were John M. Hooper, Mr. and Mrs. E. F. Wilbur and E. T. Parsons.

The Laurel Court of the Fairmont has been the scene of many pretty teas, luncheons and parties during the past week. Among the notable luncheons was that of Mrs. Clem Tobin who entertained a score of her friends on Monday. Some of her guests were Mrs. Andrew Welch, Mrs. Dillingham, Mrs. Thos. Driscoll, Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Gus Taylor, Mrs. J. O. Tobin, Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick, Miss Augusta Foute, Miss Hopkins and Miss Martin.

Another pretty luncheon party on the same day was that of Miss Jean Gallois whose guests included Miss Alexandra Hamilton, Miss Keeney, Miss Foster, Miss Dorothy Baker, Miss Coffin, Miss Claire Nichol, Miss Helen Baker and Miss Dolly McGavin.

Today Minister Jonkeer Loudon of Holland will give a luncheon to some thirty of his friends in the Laurel Court of the Fairmont. This will be in the nature of a farewell party as Herr Loudon will leave for his post at Washington very shortly.

Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Coe of Boston will spend the winter at Del Monte, as has been their custom for some year.

Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Strecker of Boston will be at Hotel Del Monte for a short time, resting after the excitement of the carnival days of the Portola.

Mrs. W. B. Murray, wife of Assistant General Passenger Agent of the Union Pacific Railroad at Omaha, arrived at Del Monte recently with her friend, Mrs. Goodsell. They were accompanied by Mr. L. M. Cheshire, representative of the Union Pacific on the coast, who is acting as their escort while they are in the State.

Among those registering at Del Monte from New York during the past week are the following: Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Reed, Mr. Frank MacGovern, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Griswold, Mr. P. E. Zinkersen, Mr. C. G. Freeman, Mr. H. B. Pendenis, Mr. and Mrs. R. T. Crane, Mr. Spencer Turner and Mr. W. H. Evans.

The combination of unusually warm weather and the advent of the Japanese man-of-war, Idsumo, in the quiet waters of Monterey Bay on Sunday afternoon brought out a large crowd of sightseers and soldiers. The long pier and promenade at the Del Monte bathing pavilion was crowded until long after the sunset gun had boomed across the hills.

Mrs. J. B. Hume, the President of the State Federation of Women's Clubs, was the guest of honor at a luncheon given by Mrs. Charles Spear at the Hotel St. Francis last Saturday. The other guests were Mrs. E. L. Baldwin, Mrs. J. W. Orr, Mrs. Henry Payot, Mme. Tojetti, Mrs. A. P. Black, Mrs. James Crawford, Mrs. W. S. Leake, Mrs. Will Madden and Mrs. B. Weaver.

The Misses Morrison of San Jose have been passing Portola week at the Hotel Fairmont. A handsome dinner was given in their honor at the Fairmont before the Portola Ball by Judge Houghton of New York. The guests were General and Mrs. W. E. Dougherty, the Misses Harrison, Captain and Mrs. Thomas S. Ashburne, Mr. Orrin Peck and Captain Wilcox, U. S. A.

"Becky Sharp" and Thackeray's Vanity Fair

By Edward F. O'Day

There are few, I take it, who have not visualized to the inner eye the principal characters which move through the inimitable pageant of Vanity Fair. Several perusals of the masterpiece in an edition which contained Thackeray's funny illustrations have given me certain treasured mental pictures of Becky and the rest which, of course, I am firmly convinced come closer to Thackeray's ideas of his creations than those which are entertained by any of my friends. This sort of self-satisfaction is one of the greatest luxuries to be derived from the reading of the great novels and there is no species of contention more enjoyable than that which consists in backing your idea of, let us say, Agnes Copperfield or the Duchesse de Langeais or Dominie Enfilden against the perfectly preposterous ideas of those human beings entertained by everybody else. It is great sport, but it is not encouraged by plays like "Becky Sharp." To reduce Becky Sharp or Rawdon Crawley or meddlesome old Briggs to terms of flesh and blood, to clothe and bewig and rouge them into the semblance of the originals and more especially to make them talk and act as somebody besides their creator thinks they might have talked and acted is, quite obviously, impossible. The experiment would be pardonable with most of the books which are dramatized but it is rather hopeless with a work like Vanity Fair; there are too many sentimental memories twining around the characters of such a book to allow even the most case-hardened critic to divest himself of his prejudices and to judge the play simply as a play and not as a making over of the novel. So I confess that I was not satisfied with Evelyn Vaughan's Becky. Miss Vaughan is too winsome for Becky; there is too much sweet womanliness in the glow of her pretty eyes and in the turn of her graceful chin; there is too much heart-throb in her voice. Becky was not pretty; she had red hair and green eyes and sharp features and no heart and she used to show her teeth and clench her fists and exhibit all the rest of the unlovely traits of the eternal feminine feline which are beyond the scope of Miss Vaughan's fragrant personality. I was a little better satisfied with the Marquis of Steyne; the fringe of red hair which Thackeray lets no reader forget was there and the cruel eyes and the cynical mouth; but E. L. Bennison was a doddering old amorist which Steyne was not. Steyne was a debauchee past his prime but not the enfeebled old libidinist portrayed at the Alcazar. I do not think that Steyne sprawled in such rickety fashion when Rawdon struck him or that he whined as he left the house; he was a virile old scoundrel with enough physical vigor to balance his mental keenness and make him the overtopping figure which the autor intended. Will Walling's Rawdon Crawley, I think, is the most faithful picture in the play. Walling looks the part of the gambling, cursing, raking, slow-witted guardsman who is the most lovable character in the book. Rawdon would wear his hair and mustache in just that way; he would laugh in very much that fashion; and when once aroused to the perfidy of his wife, would rage in the wrecking madness which Walling simulated. I do not think there was enough of the gentleman in Howard Hickman's Pitt Crawley; Thackeray made him a very polished hypocrite. As for old Sir Pitt Crawley, Charles Dow Clark made him dirty and vulgar enough, but erred in having him speak like a cockney. James Corrigan's Joseph Sedley was scarcely fat enough to fill the proportions of the eidolon in my mind. Adele Belgarde's Miss Crawley was rather a parallel of Thackeray than Thackeray himself. Harrison Ford's George Osborne was not Thackeray's for the simple reason that the writer of the play did not make him so. As for Amelia

EDDIE FOY AND SOME OF HIS CHILDREN

As they appear in "Mr. Hamlet of Broadway," coming to the Valencia Theatre Sunday night. The quaint comedian is the happy father of twelve, and he and Mrs Foy have adopted seven more.

Sedley and Dobbin I never could take enough interest in their milksoppy personalities to make it worth my while to visualize them but I remember very well how Thackeray drew them in his illustrations and must allow that Grace Travers and William Garwood make fitting presentment of the pictures. It may seem a dubious sort of compliment to these players thus to dissect their interpretations; nevertheless I sincerely regard it as a real tribute to their mimicry that they stir one to interesting comparisons with the great originals. Certainly I found the evening spent at the Alcazar in calling up the old memories of Russell Square and Park Lane and Curzon street and the lodgings at Pumpernickel with which Thackeray has so vividly impressed our minds, one of the pleasantest I have had for many days.

"The Traveling Salesman" Next Week

On Monday night next at the Van Ness a two weeks' engagement will begin for Henry B. Harris' latest comedy success, "The Traveling Salesman" by James Forbes, author of "The Chorus Lady." "The Traveling Salesman" is a play that deals with that very interesting character, the "drummer." Naturally it embodies no discussion of serious topics; it is a play intended by the author to amuse and entertain. It ran in New York for over nine months, following which it had a run of six months in Chicago. The company will include Mark Smith, James O'Neil Jr., Clifford Strok, Lawrence Shechan, Theodore Kehwald, Daniel Jarrett, Guy B. Hoffman, Emmett Shackleford, Robert Hamilton, Miss Miriam Nesbit, Miss Diana Huneker, Miss Marion Stephenson and Miss Virginia Hamilton.

JOHN PHILIP SOUSA
"The March King"

Eddie Foy After Many Years

The last performances of "The Ringmaster" will take place at the Valencia this Saturday afternoon and evening and on Sunday night the Shuberts announce Eddie Foy, the great funmaker, in his newest musical whimsicality, "Mr. Hamlet of Broadway." Edgar Smith is responsible for the book in which the melancholy Dane is travestied. "Mr. Hamlet of Broadway" has to do with the efforts of a summer colony in the Adirondacks to present an out-of-door performance of Shakespeare's play. In the cast supporting Mr. Foy will be found Belle Gold, remembered for her work in "The Ham Tree," and many other favorites. Seventy-five people take part in the production and there are at least a score of catchy musical numbers. The only matinees of "Mr. Hamlet of Broadway" will be given on Saturday and on Tuesday evening Mr. Foy will read election returns from the stage in his own unique style. Foy was a great favorite in San Francisco in the days of the David Henderson extravaganzas.

The Sousa Concerts

The sale of seats will open at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s on Monday morning for the eight concerts to be given by Sousa and his band at Dreamland Rink, commencing with a matinee next Thursday afternoon, November 4, and ending Sunday night, November 7. At each concert an entirely new program will be given. For the opening night the numbers will be: Overture, "Spring" by Goldmark; Cornet Solo, "Showers of Gold" (new), Clarke, Suite, "People Who Live in Glass Houses" (new), Sousa; Duet for soprano and mezzo-soprano, "Contes D'Hoffman," the Misses Hoyt; Prelude to the Russian Drama, "Crime and Punishment," Rachmaninoff; "Entr' Act," Helmsburger; March, "The Glory of the Yankee Navy,"

MINNIE SELIGMAN
The famous emotional actress who will begin an engagement this Sunday afternoon at the Orpheum.

Sousa; Violin Solo, Miss Florence Hardeman and "Slavonic Rhapsodie" (new), Friedman. On Friday night, November 5, a special program devoted entirely to Wagner and Sousa has been arranged. Monday afternoon and night, November 8, Sousa will give special programs at the Greek Theatre at Berkeley. On Wednesday night, November 10, Sousa will appear at Stanford University.

"In Old Kentucky" Again

"In Old Kentucky" will be presented at the Garrick for a week starting with a matinee tomorrow. The play is now almost a classic. It is in its seventeenth consecutive season on the road. The tale of the wild-flower girl from the Kentucky mountains is as well known as "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and a detailed description of how brave little Madge Brierly saves her lover's life by swinging across a chasm on a slender rope, and later saves his wealth by riding his beauty "Queen Bess" to victory, is quite unnecessary. This will be the last of the John Cort attractions at the Garrick, and following "In Old Kentucky" comes the long heralded "Three Twins," said to be a great musical comedy. Gottlob, Marx and Co. of the Van Ness assume the Garrick management with this engagement.

The Jomelli Concerts

The opening concerts of the Greenbaum season will be given by Mme. Jean Jomelli, the Dutch soprano from Hammerstein's Manhattan Opera Company and Covent Garden. Mme. Jomelli is one of the most successful singers on the concert platform and is said to possess a voice of marvelous beauty. She will give three concerts in this city, presenting programs of songs in French, German, English and Italian and will sing some new operatic numbers including selections from Charpentier's "Louise," Massenet's "Thais" and Pucini's "La Tosca." Associated with Mme. Jomelli will be Miss Marie Nichols, a young American violin virtuosa, who has won her laurels with the great symphony orchestras of Berlin, Leipsic, Dresden, Paris, London and America. She has appeared both in Boston and on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mary Adele Case at the Novelty

The greatest interest is being manifested in the concerts to be given at the Novelty Theatre by Mary Adele Case, the young Oregonian contralto who has been singing with great success in Paris at the famous American Church and who recently completed a long tour with Harold Bauer. Miss Case came home to visit her mother without intending to appear in concert but she has been induced to make a few public appearances before her return to Paris. Manager Greenbaum heard of the splendid work the artist has been doing and induced her to give him a few days of her time and two concerts are announced, the dates being Friday night, November 19 and Sunday afternoon, November 21. Miss Case will have the assistance of Mr. F. M. Biggerstaff, a pianist who is too seldom heard in public. Seats will be ready on Tuesday, November 16, at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

THE FAMOUS POKER GAME SCENE IN "THE TRAVELING SALESMAN"

At the Van Ness Theatre next week.

Monday evening will be "Shore Acres," James A. Herne's celebrated play of American life. This piece has not been seen across the bay since the author himself starred in it a good many years ago, and as the stock players are also giving it its first popular price presentation there, it should be an exceedingly popular offering. Henry Shumer has been entrusted with the Herne role, and all the other favorites will be happily cast. "Shore Acres" will have the usual one week's run, after which the Bishop players will be seen in the first Pacific Coast presentation of "The Traitor," the play taken from Thomas Dixon's novel of the south.

Minnie Seligman at the Orpheum

The well known actress Minnie Seligman and William Bramwell will appear at the Orpheum next week in Gerald Villiers Stuart's one act play "The Drums of Doom," which created quite a sensation when originally produced in London by Mrs. Beerbohm Tree and Lewis Waller. A clever and agile acrobatic act will be given by the Bounding Gordons. The work of this trio is gracefully executed and the youngest is a "bounding wonder." With the aid of a flexible mat he throws backward and forward somersaults alighting on the shoulders of his companion in a pyramid position. Katchen Loisset, a recent Orpheum importation, will appear for the first time in this city. She sings English and German songs and introduces her trained pigeons and a mimic dog called "Honey." The Bootblack Quartette has an ensemble of melody and fun. Next week will be the last of Hal Godfrey who will be seen in a new comedy of New York life by Edmund Day entitled "The Liar." It will also be the final week of Keno, Walsh and Melrose, "General" Edward La Vine and of Mlle. Bianci. There will be new motion pictures.

Rural Drama at Alcazar

No other play of American rural life possesses the charm of "Shore Acres," which is to be the Alcazar's offering for a week, commencing next Monday evening. Stage director Fred J. Butler whose greatest hit in the Alcazar was made when he played Uncle Nat about two years ago, will reappear in the part, and Will R. Walling will again be seen as Martin Berry, with Adele Belgarde as his good-hearted wife, Evelyn Vaughan as their daughter and all the other favorites suitably cast. The entire scenic production will be new, including the wonderful lighthouse effect with a foundering ship in the distance. This scene had much to do with winning for the play the popularity it possesses for admirers of stage realism.

Maugham's New Comedy

According to the London critics, Mr. Somerset Maugham's latest comedy, "Smith," soon to be seen in this country, would be all the better for a little judicious editing. In his zeal for the enunciation of wholesome truths he has permitted himself to forget the requirements of good taste. Apparently he has been taking a leaf out of the book of Alfred Sutro. His hero, after a term of useless, wasteful, demoralizing years in London, has been converted into a strong and healthy man by a course of hard labor in colonial backwoods, and—coming back to town—is disgusted with the shallowness, the immorality, the luxuriousness, and the general irresponsibility of fashionable society. He wants to know what has become of the wives and mothers and scatters virtuous platitudes in all directions with superb faith in his own virtue and originality. Some of his talk is in Mr. Maugham's best vein, and is exceedingly amusing, some of it—if truth be told—is not a little tiresome, while some is objectionable. But there is no doubt of the success of the piece. After seeking in vain among his social equals for a wife capable of fulfilling all domestic duties, including those of motherhood, he finds her finally in "Smith," the pretty housemaid. At first the damsel refuses him, on the score that she is no believer in unequal matches, but when she discovers that he can draw a cork better than the butler, she throws herself in his arms. On the whole "Smith" seems to be more valuable for its amusing than for its didactic qualities. It may be doubted whether, as a rule, marriage with a housemaid is the final and wisest solution of all matrimonial problems.

The illustration this week portrays the latest style of Feather Weight Storm Coats, which have become the rage in London and New York. These storm coats are warranted to be absolutely waterproof as well as dustproof, and are able to stand all sorts of climates. The distinctive feature of these productions is the "feather weight" character of the materials, garments averaging in weight but 2¼ pounds. These storm coats are perfectly made, finished with seams cemented, sown and strapped. They are unhesitatingly recommended to gentlemen who need protection from the heavy rain falls and whose pleasure or business calls them into the open in heavy rains.

Sweater Coats will be more fashionable and popular than ever. At the end of last fall season, sweater coats became very popular and dealers foresaw this demand. Their supply was inadequate to the demand and left many patrons wanting for them this year. The reason for this sudden demand is that these sweater coats can be put to many uses, walking, driving, playing golf, etc. These coats are produced from $2.50 up as high as $15.00 and are often finished with silk sleeves. Motor scarfs are also made. These sweater coats are put up in the following colors: oxford plain, oxford and maroon, oxford and navy, tobacco and tan, navy plain, oxford and cardinal, tobacco and green, tan and seal brown and heather.

sisted in spite of all obstacles must ever be scored to their credit. Funds came in slowly but at times with gratifying liberality. Although the Southern Pacific and the Santa Fe railroads which were to reap a golden harvest from the Portola refused to contribute one penny, Patrick Calhoun wrote a check for $5,000; the Emporium gave $1,000; the St. Francis a similar amount; the Fairmont, $500; and James D. Phelan, besides contributing $200 in cash, allowed the committee free office space in his building which amounted to $1800. The total collections were about $90,000 and although the total expenses amounted to about $120,000 the committee is confident that they will have no difficulty in making up the deficit from the voluntary contributions of merchants who refused to give in advance but who have derived such business benefits from the festival that they experience a tardy generosity. What these business benefits were cannot be accurately calculated; but as there were at least 750,000 visitors and perhaps more, within the city during the days of the festival, it must be a conservative estimate to say that at least $5,000,000 were spent in addition to the usual volume of trade.

The great question of the past week has been: What brought the crowds here? That query can only be properly answered by the men who had charge of the publicity campaign and of these Homer Boushey was the chief. Beginning with the beauty contest for the choice of a queen of the carnival, 4,000 papers were furnished with matter regarding the Portola. Thereafter 8,800 newspapers in all parts of the country were reached systematically through the Associated Press and the United Press, the two great news bureaus. This work began in February with a weekly service of news bearing on the Portola and gradually, as the days of festival drew near and in accordance with advices received from the railway companies, the field was narrowed until 1500 papers in different parts of the country were being supplied twice a week with readable news sent in matrix ready for the stereotyper or in the form of printed and "headed" copy with appropriate photographs. All the railroads were induced to issue special Portola folders; the Portola posters were sent to every hotel and bank in the United States and to many abroad; 25,000 booklets entitled "The Exiles" were addressed to San Franciscans in all parts of the world, calling them home; 5,000,000 stickers were sent out by local business men on the envelopes of their correspondence; mercantile houses with eastern or European connections enclosed circulars with their mail; 1,500,000 postals went to all parts of the globe; 500,000 letterheads and envelopes were used in official Portola correspondence. Every convention which has been held in this country since February was attended by a special envoy from San Francisco who explained the purpose and scope of the festival and invited visitors.

These were some of the wheels of that mysterious machinery of Portola which the unselfish committeemen have kept in concealment. Is it any wonder that the Portola succeeded? That the distressing blunders which marred the Hudson-Fulton celebration in New York were avoided? That the Spanish minister declared that never in a world-wide experience had he been so royally entertained, every wish so carefully anticipated, every comfort so zealously provided? Similar encomiums might be repeated here from other distinguished visitors who participated in the celebration, but after all the greatest tribute to the affair and to the men who conducted it is the unanimous acknowledgment of all San Franciscans that their greatest anticipations were outdone, that their doubts were shown to be groundless and that their laggard faith in their own people had received a fillip so stimulating that it will probably never fail again.

Mr. Don. McKay, manager of the Seattle branch and F. O. Nelson, manager of the Los Angeles branch, arrived in the city Saturday and will accompany Mr. Mathewson, Pacific Coast manager of the Diamond Rubber Co. to Akron, Ohio, for the yearly conference.

The main road from Bakersfield to Maricopa is in exceedingly poor shape at the present time, according to Louis Oldcese, the Studebaker automobile agent in that part of the State. After leaving Conner's lane the big stretch of alkali is encountered. This, while passable, is soft and full of treacherous ruts. Beyond that point the automobiles have smooth sailing until the west road along the San Emidio fence is reached. This is terribly cut up, being full of dangerous chuck holes and ruts for miles and an automobile can make but little time over it. This portion will be improved after a good rain, but, the alkali will be well nigh impassable after a thorough soaking. In and around Maricopa and between Moron and Maricopa the roads have been placed in good shape.

Pardon me, madame, I think I have seen you somewhere."
"Very likely, I go there very often."

Broadway there was a man walking around in the most sensational overcoat I ever laid my eyes on." Then would follow an exact description of the coat; and the whole family would shake their heads and laugh.

When Claflin reached "The Apollo" that evening with his coat, a cry of horror arose. Count de Mirabelle, the fencing-master, wrung his hands in distress and swore:

"By Louis XIV, to whom I am related, very closely related, ladies and gentlemen,—I should not know Monsieur Claflin if I met him on the street."

Armstrong, the comic-magazine artist, urged him to pose as a model for him in the coat. Hendricks, the architect, roared like a lion when he spoke. When they asked him why he roared, since nobody was hard of hearing, he replied:

"It's the overcoat. It's so loud that a person can't hear himself speak." At this joke everybody shook with laughter. Claflin laughed with them, though nothing could rouse him from his Olympic calm.

"I admit," he answered good-humoredly, "that the coat is really a little loud, but I shall wear it nevertheless. The fact that all other men wear different coats seems to me no reason for my taking it off. There is nothing more cowardly, foolish, and spiritless than the tyranny of fashion, which has never been so cowardly, stupid, and spiritless as among us. In other countries they are much more tolerant about it. As a man of character, I am above this tyranny. I wear what suits me, not what others prescribe. But the true reason why I bought this coat is a different one. It is to bring me the long-sought fame which my works have not brought. In the land of sameness one only needs to do something that the rest do not do to attract notice. Let's wait; I know my countrymen."

Every afternoon at three o'clock Claflin used to lay down his pen and go for a walk on Fifth avenue and Broadway, partly on account of his health and partly in order to get new impressions or to refresh himself with the sight of pretty girls, for he was a great worshipper of the fair sex. Punctually at the accustomed hour he appeared the next day on Fifth avenue. It was the same story. Everybody stared at the yellow coat and walked along surmissing who the man could be. In the Cafe Martin, where he rested according to habit, the ladies ceased ogling and commented to their escorts upon the strange coat and its wearer. Claflin sipped his sherry flip calmly and smiled to himself.

"These idiots," he said half aloud. "But my plan doesn't seem to be so foolish."

When he left the cafe, he wandered up Fifth avenue again on the east side, doubtless the most observed man on the whole avenue. At Forty-second street he decided to cross in order to continue his walk on the other side of the avenue. With the heavy traffic at this busy crossing, that was no trifle. The policeman now and then stopped all the vehicles in order to let the pedestrians cross the street without accident. Just as the policeman gave the vehicles right of way once more, Claflin slipped quickly between some carriages. With a powerful leap he flashed past a young, skittish cab-horse like a huge, frightened canary bird. The horse shied at the unusual sight and ran away, up the avenue. A great commotion arose. Men yelled, women screamed, everyone jumped aside, policemen blew their whistles shrilly. A mounted policeman galloped down like a tornado, seized the horse, turned him round, and brought him to a stand-still when he was within a hair's breadth of smashing into a carriage. A very distinguished gentleman, pale as chalk, sprang hastily out of the cab. In a twinkling a crowd had collected.

"It was that d-d-damned canary! The horse shied at him," cried the driver, panting for air, as he looked round wildly from his high seat. "There he is—he's over there."

Claflin was coming along very calmly. A policeman ran over and forced him to go to the carriage.

"Not too near—stay behind the carriage, you miserable canary bird," yelled the driver. "The horse will run away again!" The crowd received Claflin with stormy laughter.

"The driver thinks you were the cause of the horse's running away," said the policeman.

"Maybe so," answered Claflin. "What can I do about it?"

"How can a person walk on Fifth avenue with such a coat?" asked the cabby.

"That doesn't concern you," said Claflin, with the greatest good humor.

"So it's none of my business if you make my horse shy and cause murder and death? I want that fellow arrested at once!"

"Well," said the policeman, "I can't arrest him on account of his coat, though it certainly is very yellow and remarkable."

"I think so, too," chimed in the distinguished gentleman in the cab, with a polite smile. "But if you will allow me to give you a piece of good advice, sir," he turned courteously to Claflin, "wear your striking overcoat only in the evening."

"Much obliged," answered Claflin. "Still, I don't understand why the worthy cab-horses should not rather grow accustomed to my coat. First comes the public, then the horses. They have had to become used to the automobiles. Mr. Vanderbilt has not been required to sell his 'yellow devil' because the horses were frightened at it. Good day, sir."

He raised his hat to the gentleman and went away unhindered. The people laughed. He had not gone far when a fat young man with red hair overtook him.

"Pardon me," said the young man. "Are you not Mr. Winfred Claflin, the poet and author?"

"I am," answered Claflin, "and who are you?"

"I am Robert Bubbles, the reporter. I happened to be a witness of the exciting incident and intend to write something about it. May I ask you how you came by this sensational coat?"

"At your service." And as they walked along, Claflin told how he had gotten the overcoat. But he took care, wisely, not to tell him why he had bought it. Bubbles thanked him, asked a few more questioned about Claflin's latest works, and went his way. At home in "The Apollo" Claflin said nothing about his experience. They would learn the whole story from the newspapers.

And so it happened. All his comrades rapped at his door the next morning, held their sides with laughter, and wanted to know how it had all come about. Oh, he would experience other things with his foolish coat, they prophesied! Bobby Bubbles' report was most detailed. It was exceedingly humorous and was even adorned by a caricaturist with pictures which represented the occurrence in comical fashion. Now Claflin discovered why such importance was laid upon the affair. The distinguished gentleman whose neck was almost broken was one of New York's millionaires.

"Great! great!" said Claflin, rubbing his hands. "You see the overcoat is beginning to work for me already. Fine! What did I tell you?"

When he appeared in his yellow coat on Fifth avenue the next afternoon, he made the surprising discovery that almost all the people he met knew him.

"Here comes the poet Claflin with his yellow coat," they said, and stared at him as though he were a wild animal.

"Idiots," thought he, and walked on calmly.

Or: "There is the poetic canary-bird who makes the horses shy."

"Idiots," thought he, and went ahead solemnly.

Or they said: "There is Mr. Claflin! Let's wait a moment. Perhaps another horse will run away."

The policeman at Forty-second street greeted him with a "How do you do, Mr. Claflin?"

In a confectionery shop where he drank his coffee, he was the center of interest for the elegant epicures of excellent families.

"Really," thought Claflin, "I should write a satire about it—about a very yellow overcoat which in two days created more attention for an author than the work of years. Idiots! Would one think it possible?"

That was only the beginning. His publisher wrote him that an unusual demand had suddenly arisen for his works. The ladies would come into his shop, so he wrote, and ask for the works of the poet with the yellow coat, as they laughingly said.

"It's all right, it's all right! Go on!" cried Claflin in delight.

Before long he was a famous man in the city. As a keen business man, his publisher made use of the fact and hastened the publication of Claflin's new stories. They found not only favorable mention but purchasers—less on account of their worth than because the poet with the yellow coat had written them. For now, as formerly, between three and five o'clock in the afternoon, Claflin strolled on Fifth avenue and Broadway with his overcoat. He even became one of the sights of New York. Often when the "Seeing New York" cars came along the guide bawled:

"This is William K. Vanderbilt's house—here is the most beautiful church in New York, the Cathedral—the man with the yellow overcoat is the poet, Winfred Claflin!" And all necks would be craned to see Claflin. The ladies eyed him with especial interest and remarked:

"Why, how fascinating he is!"

And they took his books home with them to Ohio and to Minnesota and Carolina and Louisiana, and told how in New York in broad daylight they had seen a real live poet, the famous Winfred Claflin, who used to walk on Fifth avenue and Broadway in a remarkable yellow overcoat.

Old Claflin? Yes, one would hardly believe how proud he is now of his son Winfred.

"Just think," he confided lately to a friend, "Winfred has already made two thousand dollars with his new book. A fine fellow! This idea of the overcoat is delightful! It's an idea that Rockefeller needn't be ashamed of."

And Claflin's friends in "The Apollo"? They have all borrowed from him, one after another, and Count de Mirabelle considers it a special honor when he, who is related, very closely related, to Louis XIV, is allowed to go walking with Claflin on Fifth avenue.

"Do you know," he said to the poet recently, "if Mrs. Vanderbilt's horses should run away on account of the overcoat, that would be a puff, wouldn't it?"

And Claflin answered condescendingly, "My dear friend, I don't need that any more."

Auto Notes

It is to be regretted that the Chalmers-Detroit "Forty" entered in the Portola Road Race met with a most unfortunate accident while running in the third lap of the race between the grandstand and Melrose, which forced it to withdraw. The Chalmers-Detroit started in seventh place but on the first lap gained fourth position. On the next lap the car jumped into second place and it was while attempting to pass another car on a bad turn that it was forced off the course smashing a wheel, which prevented the car from continuing the race. Considering that this car was entered by a private owner against special racing cars of double its horsepower and price, it was most unfortunate that this accident should have happened inasmuch as it was fast overtaking the leader of the race and would without a doubt have given some very interesting exhibitions of speed. In the practice trials previous to the race the car showed a speed of better than seventy-five miles per hour. Mr. Howard Warner who piloted the Chalmers-Detroit showed great daring.

C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast Manager of the Diamond Rubber Co., stated the other day that an accurate count of the pneumatic tires exhibited on new 1910 models at the Emporium automobile show gave Diamonds 30 cars while the total of all other makes of tires combined was but 29. When the number of other makes represented on the coast is considered this showing indicates what a remarkable demand there is for the Diamond product.

John Brichetto of Banta has now legal evidence that he owns a fast car. Although one of the oldest drivers in the State, he was told in the park Thursday that his Thomas seventy was going a trifle too fast to suit the local officer and the chances are that he will be called upon to contribute to the city fund.

The Diamond Rubber Co. are just in receipt of a very nice letter from W. R. Withee, Franklin agent at Pendleton, advising that before entering his car in the Pendleton relay race, the Diamond Tires thereon had already covered 5,000 miles and went through the entire relay event after that mileage, without the least trouble.

Ralph Phillips of Laton, California, is another visitor for the week, having driven up in his 1910 Chalmers "30."

Arthur W. Goodfellow, another Fresno motorist, is in town with his new six-seventy Thomas.

Dr. W. J. Young of Stockton took delivery of a Chalmers-Detroit "30" a week ago and in company with H. H. Thompson of the Central Auto Company, drove from the Oakland Mole to the Stockton Courthouse in record breaking time, two hours and forty-five minutes.

The following telegram which has just been received by the Pioneer Automobile Company from the factory, will give an idea of the popularity of the Hudson runabout: "Working night and day to increase production Hudsons. Shipping twelve more this month, thirty November, thirty December, increased shipments thereafter."

W. R. Taylor of Florin, Sacramento County, accompanied by Mrs. Taylor and Mr. and Mrs. Upenheimer arrived in San Francisco Thursday after a six hours trip from their home, by way of San Jose. They had a most excellent trip in Mr. Taylor's thirty horsepower Chalmers-Detroit, without even a puncture to mar their pleasure. In speaking of the trip Mr. Taylor said that the roads were in excellent condition. He was more than pleased with the journey and intends to travel back at night. Mr. Taylor has been one of the fortunate ones in the handling of his automobile, his expenses having been absolutely nothing for repairs.

While in Fresno President Taft was taken over the famous Kearny Drive in Mr. George Roeding's Thomas Flyer. The President was greatly pleased and astonished that the drive was not more celebrated outside of California.

F. W. Miller of Santa Cruz arrived in the city recently, having driven his Chalmers-Detroit "30" up in four and a half hours. This is considered remarkably good time as there were five grown people in the party, with their baggage, weighing in all about 700 pounds. Mr. Miller drove over the Santa Cruz Mountains by way of Los Gatos and San Jose. This road, he says, is very fine just now and much better than the Chittenden Cut Off. There is a stretch of about ten miles on leaving Santa Cruz which might be improved, but after that one could not ask for a better road. There is no dust and it is as smooth as a boulevard.

The Howard Automobile Company, distributors for the Pacific Coast of Buicks and Oldsmobiles, is exhibiting a complete line of the 1910 products of those factories at their salesrooms.

The Howard Automobile Company, together with several other automobile dealers did not participate in the automobile show, preferring to use its own salesroom which is more commodious and spacious.

The big "Oldsmobile Limited" with its 42-inch Jinrikisha wheels, the innovation of the Oldsmobile factory which never fails to create interest everywhere it makes its appearance, is always the center of admiration.

"The Silver Horde"

With the salmon pack of the Columbia river canneries alone valued at eleven million dollars for the season of 1909, it will be seen at once that Rex Beach has taken no small and transient industry as the background for his new Alaskan novel, "The Silver Horde." One would like to state at the outset that this is not a woman's story, in the hope that the natural perversity of the sex would send a few hundred thousand of them on a quest to discover why, but at any rate it is far more likely to interest men than women, for the sentimental is often submerged by the practical, and though women are not above nagging the men of their own households for losing dollar opportunities, they dearly love a hero who will throw fortune to the winds at the beck of a lily white hand. It is a young Chicagoan, Boyd Emerson, who has set out to the northland to win a fortune with which to claim the daughter of the richest man in America. Boyd has nothing but the optimism of youth and faith in the girl who really is not worth the exertion of a tramp to cross the road for, but it takes him a long while to learn it. Her father, Wayne Wayland, organizer of trusts, has seemed to smile on the courtship, and it is only when Boyd formally presents himself as a suitor that he discovers that he has been in a sort the victim of a plot, for Mr. Wayland has deliberately given the impecunious youth every opportunity to bask in the society of plutocrats in order that he might see for himself how much of a fortune it will require to maintain Miss Mildred in her accustomed luxury and how little opportunity there is for him to acquire it. With a promise from the girl to wait three years, when the conquering hero expects to return laden with Alaskan gold, Emerson sets out for the northland, and when we meet him it is a beaten man, discouraged and spiritless, returning to the "states." He has just missed fortune a score of times, by as narrow a margin as the trick could be turned. Having broken through the ice with his companion and their dog team, he meets a new and singular development of the cold shoulder, for, despite their miserable condition, wet through in a freezing atmosphere, they are refused food and shelter at every place that they ask for it, not only refused, but threatened and driven away until, in sheer desperation, at the next cabin, instead of knocking and asking they enter and demand. Here they meet not only hospitality but an explanation of the surliness of the other inhabitants, who are the care takers of the canneries, closed for the winter, under strict orders to admit no one under any pretext lest they be themselves turned out. The owner of the hospitable cabin is an old friend of Mr. Beach's readers, Cherry Malotte of "The Spoilers," and just as generous, sensible, practical and whole hearted as she was in the Nome days. She is unknown to Boyd Emerson though his companion, Frazer, of many aliases and a past too black to be called checkered, recognizes her at once but has the grace and decency to keep quiet. Indeed, scalawag and good for naught that he is all through, Frazer has the virtue of a still tongue when often, by a word ill considered, he might work endless harm. To Emerson, who has gone into the north straight from plutocratic society, to whom there has been so much new and strange, and who is so absorbed, moreover, in the failure of his own plans, as to be all but indifferent, there is nothing mysterious in the fact of a rather young woman living by herself with her half breed servants, especially as she explains that she is in a partnership with prospectors, her share being to "stay by the stuff." It is in the couse of her explanation of the surly conduct of the Swede keepers that Cherry tells of the enormous profits to be reaped from the short salmon season, the determination of the cannery companies to discourage any invasion of the Kalvik river and their unscrupulousness as to means or results as long as they shut out competition and interference of every kind. Her recital arouses Emerson to action once more. He sees a chance to redeem himself and claim Mildred if only he can break into the fishing business, and Cherry it appears, once took up an available site on the river, and likewise, the cause of big George Balt, a primitive giant who knows but two things in the world, fishing and fighting Balt had once been an important factor in the fishing business It was he who built and put into working order the Marsh cannery and he had been superintendent of the works afterward, but he had a streak of obstinacy in his make-up that impelled him to hold on to a site of his own which Marsh wanted not because he needed it but simply through the spirit of greed and grasp which is the essential of a "successful" American business man. So George was outlawed as completely as if he had been living in the sixteenth century with a bill of attainder against him. No one could or would employ him and no store would furnish him with necessaries, even for coin payment. No one could hold communication with him on pain of similar treatment, and Cherry Malotte was the only person of either sex or any nationality who dared be independent. With Balt's knowledge of the fishing and canning business, Cherry's site and Emerson's enthusiasm and confidence in his ability to raise the necessary capital the new company was formed, and now begins a heart-breaking story of a superhuman fight against tremendous odds. In order to have the factory ready for work at the beginning of the new season hours and minutes were as years at another time. When steamers make a port of call once in two months to be ever so little behind is a disaster, and yet under some conditions, to venture forth at all is to court death. Secrecy was another essential to success in this case for at best it was but a fighting chance. No sooner was the new firm fairly under way when Emerson discovered that though hitherto there had been no incorporated combine of the salmon canneries, now, under the guidance of his prospective father-in-law, the North American Packing Company had been formed, and Willis Marsh, the most unscrupulous, law defying and tyrannical of the old owners was high in command in the new interest. Marsh was, likewise, a suitor for the hand of Mildred Wayland, favored by her father, though the lady herself, as veritable an example of the "rag and a bone and a hank of hair" as ever was put into existence, was really too egotistically selfish and cold to care for any one, and Emerson was too busy to perceive it. The exasperating interferences which the new company began to experience as soon as their plans were discovered—the refusal of the banks all over the northwest to advance money they had promised ,the side-tracking of cars of machinery, the failure of the lumber companies to deliver cargoes, the delays in receiving machinery and the apparently unaccountable loss of essential parts, the cancelling of the ship charter, the strike of the stevedores, the mobbing of the fishing crew, and all the heart-breaking devices to defeat them, with the superhuman efforts by which they were overcome, are set forth in graphic style. There are some remarkably fine bits of description in "The Silver Horde," notably that of the salmon run. Mr. Beach might have made his story as revolting as Upton Sinclair made "The Jungle," but he has wisely refrained from going into any unnecessary particulars. The characters are all distinctive, and as is often the case where east and west come together, the honors are with the west, even the disreputable Frazer showing to better advantage than Alton Clyde, the insignificant little shrimp who deserved to be fed to the salmon if they could have been induced to eat him. Mr. Beach may lack "literary finish," but he knows how to tell a story, and that is the first business of the novelist. Published by Harper and Brothers.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 24,299, Dept. 12.

ELLA REEVES, Plaintiff,
vs.
JOHN T. REEVES, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to JOHN T. REEVES, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion and wilful neglect, and determining and adiudging that plaintiff is the owner of the certain real property described in the complaint herein, as her separate property, and also for alimony and counsel fees; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 23d day of July, A. D. 1909.

WILLIAM C. ESPY, sometimes known as W. C. ESPY, and MARY CATHERINE ESPY, his wife, Plaintiffs.

vs.

All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California, to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of WILLIAM C. ESPY, sometimes known as W. C. ESPY, and MARY CATHERINE ESPY, his wife, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and county, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, bounded and more particularly described as follows:

Parcel No. 1. Commencing at a point on the Northerly line of "A" Street, distant thereon eighty-two (82) feet six (6) inches Westerly from the Westerly line of Tenth Avenue; running thence Westerly along the said Northerly line of "A" Street twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Northerly one hundred (100) feet; thence at right angles Easterly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles Southerly one hundred (100) feet to the Northerly line of "A" Street and the point of commencement. Being a portion of Outside Lands Block number Two Hundred and Seventy-four (274).

Parcel No. 2. Commencing at a point on the Easterly line of Third Avenue, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet Southerly from the Southerly line of Clement Street; running thence Southerly along said Easterly line of Third Avenue twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Easterly one hundred and twenty (120) feet; thence at right angles Northerly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles Westerly one hundred and twenty (120) feet to the Easterly line of Third Avenue and the point of commencement. Being a portion of Outside Lands Block number One Hundred and Eighty-three (183).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That the above entitled Court make and enter its decree:

1st.—Ascertaining and determining all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description.

2nd.—Establishing and determining the title of plaintiff to said property and that plaintiff be adjudged and decreed to be the owner in fee simple absolute of all of said property.

3rd.—For such other and further relief as to the Court may seem just.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 25th day of September, 1909.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 5950, N. S. Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of TOMASSO DEMATTEI, (also known as TOMOSO DEMOTTEI), Deceased.

It appearing to the satisfaction of the Court from the verified petition of CAROLINA DEMATTEI, administratrix of the Estate of TOMASSO DEMATTEI, also known as TOMOSO DEMOTTEI, deceased, on file herein, that it is necessary to sell a part of the estate of said deceased in order to pay the debts, expenses and charges of administration of the estate of said deceased, which have already accrued, and which will or may accrue hereafter during the administration of said estate and that it will be to the best interest, advantage and benefit of said estate and of all the persons interested therein.

It is ordered by the Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said TOMASSO DEMATTEI, also known as TOMOSO DEMOTTEI, deceased, appear before the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, at the Courtroom of Department No. 10 thereof in the Grant Building, situated on the Southeast corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in said County and State, on the 3rd day of November, 1909, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why an order, as prayed for in the petition, should not be granted to the said administratrix to sell all that part of the real estate of said deceased, at either public or private sale, for the purposes mentioned in the petition, as he shall judge to be for the best interests of said estate and of the parties interested therein which said part of said parcel of real property is described as follows:

All that certain piece or parcel of land situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and more particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the Southwesterly line of Holyoke Street distant thereon Two Hundred (200) feet Northwesterly from the Northwesterly line of Silliman Street; running thence Northwesterly and along said Southwesterly line of Holyoke Street Twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Southwesterly One Hundred Twenty (120) feet; thence at right angles Southeasterly Twenty-five (25) feet and thence at right angles Northeasterly One Hundred and Twenty (120) feet to the Southwesterly line of Holyoke Street and the point of commencement.

Being part of Lot No. 1 in Block No. 37, University Homestead Association.

It is further ordered, that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four (4) successive weeks, in "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in said county.

Dated, this 27th day of September, 1909.

Wit and Humor

"Well," said the first bicyclist, "we ought to be right in the middle of Bliggville, according to the map, yet, as you may see for yourself, we are on a mud road some miles from anywhere." "I can't understand it," said the second bicyclist, "unless the map was made by some of those naval experts."

"Willie," said his father as he proceeded with the laying on of hands, "I am sorry to have to do this—it hurts me more than it does you." "Well," returned the precocious youngster, resignedly, "I never did believe in these here sympathetic strikes anyhow. They always do more harm than good."

The star boarder, who was reading his paper at breakfast, suddenly gave a low shriek and fell to the floor. The more curious among those present picked up the paper and saw what had shocked him. It was an item, reading: "California will ship 60,000,000 pounds of prunes to the Eastern markets this year."

"Now, look here," said the lawyer, shaking his fist at the witness, "I want you to understand that you can't bamboozle me in this court simply because you're a woman." "Why," she asked in her sweetest tone, "is your wife present?"

"Pa, what's the first requisite of a patriot?" "That he belong to our party."

The Bishop—Wouldn't you like to be born again, little girl? The Child—No, ther; I wath born in Bothton the very firth time!

Wild-Eyed Man—I want to arrange for a divorce! Polite Shopgirl—Two aisles down. This is the counter where we marry people.

Claribel—You told me you were never going to write to young Hankinson again. Adelina—He's sent me a dozen letters I haven't answered; but in his last one he left a page out, and I had to write and ask him what it was about.

"Could you do the landlord in the 'Lady of Lyons'?" asked the manager of a seedy actor. "Well, I should think I might; I have done a good many landlords."

"My wife can tell what time it is in the middle of the night when it is pitch dark." "How does she do it?" "She makes me get up and look at the clock."

An old woman entered a savings bank the other day and walked up to the desk. "Do you want to withdraw or deposit?" asked the clerk. "Naw, Oi doant. Oi wants to put some in," was the reply. The clerk pushed up the book for her signature and said: "Sign on this line, please." "Above it or below it?" Just above it." "Me whole name?" "Yes." "Before Oi was married?" "No, just as it is now." "Oi can't wroite."

As the daily train reached a Vermont village the other day, an antique-looking dame thrust her head out of the window opposite the refreshment room and briefly shouted: "Sonny!" A bright-looking boy came up to the window. "Little boy," she said, "have you a mother?" "Yes, ma'am." "Do you go to school?" "Yes, ma'am." "And are you faithful to your studies?" "Yes, ma'am." "Do you say your prayers every night?" "Yes, ma'am." "Can I trust you to do an errand for me?" "Yes, ma'am." "I think I can, too," said the lady, looking steadily down on the manly face. "Here is five cents to get me an apple. Remember, God sees you."

Mature Beauties

Diana de Poitiers was over thirty-six when Henry II, just half her age, became attached to her, and she was held to be the most beautiful woman in court up to the monarch's death and the accession of Catherine de Medici.

Livia was thirty-three when she won the heart of Augustus and she maintained her ascendency to the last.

Ninon de l'Enclos, the most celebrated wit and beauty of her day, was the idol of three generations of the golden youth of France. She was seventy-three when the Abbe de Berais fell in love with her.

To give you nothing and to make you expect everything, to dawdle on the threshold of love while the doors are closed, this is all the science of a coquette.—De Bernard.

"Mutual Confidence and Foreign Capital"

From "THE CITIZEN," issued October 26, 1909

The man who has the strength of purpose and of character to gather together tens of thousands of citizens and organize them successfully into a body which betters the condition of toiler, merchant and business-man alike, is surely a man in whom the world must have confidence. If P. H. McCarthy has possessed the patience, determination and unalterable honesty necessary for the perpetuation of the Building Trades Council of this city and State, without tolerating tyranny or injustice to any man, he must surely be recognized as a man who has the intelligence, genius, and skill to govern. There can be no disputing the fact that P. H. McCarthy has organized workingmen, conscientiously and with care, to the inestimable benefit of the business and social world at large. If P. H. McCarthy has been able successfully to organize the workingman, it is undeniable that he is likewise able to organize capital.

P. H. McCarthy, when Mayor, is not going to scare away capital, nor deter the investor from coming here. To the contrary, he is, as a man who understands the rights and the aims of all elements, going to inspire absolute confidence in the men of this Coast and of the East who would invest their money here, and he is going to attract by his ability and integrity, the investor who would be reluctant to enter a city with his money where bosses reigned, or where factional or industrial strife was likely to flourish.

Capital is never quite so content as when there is absolute peace in a community, and a small likelihood of industrial trouble. The workingman has reason to repose confidence in P. H. McCarthy for he has been put to the test and weighed in the scale for many years. The capitalist and banker likewise have reason to entrust their interests to a municipality governed by P. H. McCarthy, for he has treated them with absolute fairness in the past, has never deceived them nor inflicted an injustice upon them. He has been as quick to defend them against wrong, as he has been to champion the toiler who stood in the shadow of calamity.

P. H. McCarthy, when elected Mayor of San Francisco, will call to his side for counsel and advice, representative men from every walk of life—men who work for wages; men who conduct small business establishments; and men who guide banking institutions. There will be no one-man government. There will be no class government. There will be, for the first time in this city, government BY the people, and to any sincere person, no matter who he may be or what he may possess, who may have a worthy suggestion to make, P. H. McCarthy, as Mayor, plans and intends to give this person his earnest consideration.

Foreign capital ever was, and ever will be, looking to this fair section for investment. Foreign capital will, when P. H. McCarthy is Mayor, have a tangible guarantee against factional and industrial strife, and will come into this city for permanent employment assured that all factions of the people are to sit down together, as one great family, and consult and work for the advancement of the city. Foreign capital stands ready for investment. P. H. McCarthy is the one man in San Francisco in a position to show the way.

The Triumph of Decency

Never have we been able to persuade ourselves into the acceptance of Abraham Lincoln's dictum about the impossibility of fooling all the people all the time. Philosophy as taught by example in history has inclined us to the view of Roscommon the poet that "the multitude is always in the wrong," but we are constrained to confess that since last Tuesday this inclination is not so strong as formerly. In a measure it has been demonstrated that the credulity of the public is not inexhaustible; that at any rate to fool the people all the time there must be employed more skill and ingenuity than have been exhibited by the over-confident and self-constituted promoters of civic purity who have had this community by the ears for about three years. The term civic purity has a specious sound and a noble bearing, but there is nothing more repugnant to the instincts of generous manhood when it is found to be serving as a mask for the embodiment of hypocrisy and vindictiveness. The people of San Francisco have seen behind the mask. By their vote they have declared that what is morally wrong cannot be politically right. They have affirmed in ringing tones that the end cannot justify the means; that a moral crusade which is productive of demoralization, which tramples upon the fundamental rights of American citizens and presumes to sweep aside the elemental principles of American justice is not to be tolerated in an American city. The people were a long time emerging from their trance, but considering the insidious and persistent efforts to prolong the obsession, the wonder is that decency and sanity were ever able to triumph. Emphatic enough, however, to suit the most bitter and unreasonable partisan was the rebuke that was administered to our self-righteous uplifters. What these pharisaical gentlemen received was nothing short of a good smashing jolt. When they heard on election night of the overwhelming vote that testified to the detestation in which they are held there must have come over their minds like a picture flashed in the dark a swift but merciless review of the cruel and brutal things that they have done in the name of justice, and poignant indeed must have been their reflections if they are at all accessible to the emotions of the average mortal. The vote that was cast against them is especially gratifying because it extinguished all doubt as to what public sentiment is not only on the subject of the graft prosecution, but with reference to the policy that has been pursued in municipal affairs by the political puppets of the Hon. James D. Phelan. The election of Charles M. Fickert would not have sufficed to indicate how the people felt about the administration in general of the municipal government. The election of P. H. McCarthy makes the matter perfectly clear. It is an overwhelming and humiliating repudiation of all that Mayor Taylor has stood for in his attitude of hostility toward the leading capitalists of the city with whom both Phelan and Spreckels have quarreled. But of course the election of McCarthy is a matter of minor significance in comparison with the defeat of Francis J. Heney, the man who served as the medium through which Justice was debauched in her temple. From his defeat we have learned that the conscience of the people has been shocked by the criminal methods pursued by him at the behest of his unconscionable masters. Upon those methods it is unnecessary for us to animadvert at this late day. With them the readers of this paper are familiar. We have been unsparing and unequivocal in our criticism of them from the moment that it was made apparent that it was the purpose of the Graft Prosecution to convict men by hook or by crook and to compel the higher courts by threats and by every species of intimidation to acquiesce in the outrageous perversions of justice practiced by trial judges of easy conscience and illimitable potentialities in roguery. There is but one shadow on us in our hour of triumph, and it is the recollection of all that has been done to prepare people abroad for the revulsion that occurred on election day. Throughout this land has been propagated the belief that the opposition in this city to the graft prosecution was grounded in considerations entirely sordid, and today unquestionably the misconception prevails that the election in San Francisco was not a triumph of decency but rather the sacrific of public honor on the polluted altar of commerce. The responsibility for this misconception rests upon Rudolph Spreckels and James D. Phelan, and, we regret to say, is shared by certain misguided ministers of the Christian religion who are generally regarded as humanizing elements in society and from whom we might have expected during our Reign of Terror the outpourings of large and liberal sentiments, but who proved themselves hard, narrow, cruel and implacable.

Significance of the Scramble for Office

"Despumation," says the New York Sun, is regarded as an apt characterization of the revolting Hearst-Gaynor contest. Casting a retrospective glance over the political campaign which has happily come to an end in this city we find that an adequate idea of the nature of it is not to be conveyed by the word which is regarded as eloquently descriptive of the mayoralty contest in New York. A much stronger word, one that is really the sign of an idea; a good virile epithet that has blossomed out of the vernacular; a pungent word that by its very sound is a vehicle to the meaning—that is the sort of word that we need to describe the turbid stream of scurrilities that rolled on during the campaign nauseating us with its superheated vapors. We have a suitable adjective in mind, but we feel that of more importance than an apt characterization of the indecent series of exhibitions of personal spleen and rancor by which people of ordinary sensitiveness were revolted during the past month, is a little wholesome reflection on the significance of such a campaign as that to which we gave countenance. It has been said that the people impart their character to their leaders, and that the active men in a state are a true sample of the mass. If these active men are coarse, brutal and depraved the commonwealth is not sound. Is it not somewhat discomforting to ponder the character of some of the men chosen by us at the last primary election to compete for the highest public offices? Have they not made it clear to us that the greed of office has transformed them into a kind of savages; that they are capable of trampling over friendship and honor and all the finer qualities of the human heart; that self-interest becomes with them an absorbing principle inducing not merely indifference to considerations of decency but to the immutable claims of humanity and justice? We are asked to believe that such men, who indulge in the most revolting brutalities, who slander one another and resort to every available species of deception, are animated by patriotic principles. And thus are we reminded of Dr. Johnson's observation that patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel. Nothing can be more lamentable than that furious fanatical spirit of partisanship that manifests itself in falsehood, detraction and calumny, filling a whole community with the basest of passions and extinguishing all the sentiments of good nature, all the finer instincts that are believed to be propagated by Christianity. Indubitably there is much room for improvement in the affairs of this city, but it is evident that we must mend our manners before we can hope to patch our morals. How absurd it is to expect to elevate the tone of the community through the medium of men who have neither self-respect nor sense of decency!

A Notable Change of Attitude

Some weeks ago we reported that there had floated into our ken a vagrant rumor respecting a change of attitude on the part of that ostentatiously moral journal, the Call, toward the appellate courts of our State. Now rumor, when it is not the messenger of defamation, is not to be despised. It is not always a pipe blown by evil surmises and malicious conjectures. Dame Rumor often proves herself a most worthy, if not the duly accredited messenger of the sublimest of things, the plain truth, which sometimes adapts itself to the sinuosities of worldly affairs instead of traveling in straight lines. Such appears to have been the office of the myriad tongued one when disseminating the report of the impending change of attitude on the part of the Spreckels journal, for something in the nature of verification occurred on Saturday last when the Call in a leading editorial respectfully and approvingly discussed some remarks made by Justice Shaw on the expedition with which litigation was handled by the District Courts of Appeal. This is the first time in about three years that the Call has been able to discover anything commendable in the performances of the courts that pronounced the indictment in the Schmitz case fatally defective. Hitherto the Call has been one of the most virulent and vicious of the inspired critics that have inveighed against the higher courts for their courageous disregard of the intimidations practiced by our unprincipled uplifters. That the Call has repented the ugly part which it played in the conspiracy to blacken the character of our higher courts that the people might be persuaded of the honesty of men by whom justice had been prostituted, it would please us to believe, but we confess that we are sceptical. Meditating on the Call's change of policy we find it difficult to banish from our mind all thought of the current contest over the estate of Claus Spreckels. Here is something that seems to justify the suspicion that a motive far from creditable might have actuated Mr. John D. Spreckels in paying a belated tribute of respect to the tribunals before which he must come in the course of the litigation by which the question of the validity of his father's will is to be determined. If Mr. Spreckels once believed that our higher courts could be intimidated by calumny, it is not unreasonable to assume that he is now laboring under the delusion that they are to be cajoled by flattery. Praises from an enemy smell of craft, says Milton in not exactly those words; and we have come to regard the Call as the enemy of the higher courts. Mr. Spreckles may be truly repentant, but if so it is unfortunate that self-interest should seem to point the way.

More Sinews Wanted

Now comes the news that Home Rule in Ireland will be realized inside the next five years. This is not a joke though it certainly has the flavor of one for people who have reached the meridian of life and who are tolerably familiar with the history of what is known as the Irish Cause. The news comes to us on the authority of Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Irish Nationalist, M. P. and journalist. Mr. O'Connor's faith in the Irish Cause is as strong today as it was in the days of the lamented Parnell. His faith never wavers. He is vindicating it at this moment by his presence on American soil, for he has come to us to gather more funds for the cause that is dear to his heart; and he is bubbling over with enthusiasm at the exhilarating prospect of England's bestowal of home rule on the long-suffering people of Ireland. "This is Ireland's great chance," he says, "to strike for the freedom of her sons and daughters and the right to govern herself; this fact cannot be too strongly impressed upon the Irish Americans to whom I am appealing." Impressing this fact on Irish Americans at this late day, Mr. O'Connor will find, is not the easy task that it was twenty-five years ago when the Land League of America was supplying the sinews of political war to the patriots of the green isle in the fond expectation of the consummation that, according to Mr. O'Connor, cannot now be delayed beyond five years. The enthusiasm of Irish Americans for the Irish Cause has abated somewhat, but perhaps the magnetic O'Connor will be able to communicate sufficient of his own to serve his purpose. In justice to Mr. O'Connor and his associates it should be stated that they have not been fighting in vain. The land bill which they obtained from a Tory administration has brought about a vast improvement of conditions in Ireland. Ireland is now comparatively a prosperous country, and it is becoming more prosperous every day. Perhaps this is one of the reasons why Irish Americans are not so deeply concerned as formerly about political affairs in the home of their forefathers.

a year by their writing. In a measure confirmatory of this statement was the plea made the other day by Stephen Phillips when he failed to comply with an order summoning him to London on some legal matter. He said that he had not the money necessary for the railway fare. Every now and then some author whose name is widely known and whose books are believed to be popular is placed on the civil pension list and thus rescued from some less dignified form of public relief. Comparatively few English authors depend on their pens for a livelihood. Many of them hold salaried positions in the government offices and many more have some business of their own which furnishes them with the necessaries, leaving their literary income to provide the luxuries. When one considers the enormous output of the press today and the circumstance that the average life of a book is about six months, at the end of which time it is literally swept out of sight by the new flood, it is easy to realize that sales must be phenomenal to more than clear expenses before the day of oblivion. As in Great Britain forty thousand copies is reckoned a large edition, the performance of a simple problem in arithmetic will suffice to convince any one that the usual royalty of ten or fifteen per cent on the whole would not produce ten thousand dollars, even if there were no question of the publication expenses before profits were reckoned. Authors of the first class and those who rank high in the second do not bring out one new book a year, or one in two years or even three, and the prolific producers of popular pot boilers are content with the sale of four or five thousand copies of their "masterpieces," which produces an income from pen labor so small as to preclude the supposition that bodies and souls are held together by it. Current delusions respecting the enormous returns from literature cause thousands to waste their lives attempting the impossible. They believe without question the reports of the high rates of compensation, so much per word or page; and assured that with a little practice they can compose a definite number of pages a day, down they sit with a pint of ink and a pound of paper, to scratch out a fortune. Many are encouraged by the wretched mediocrity of the stuff they see in print. They are unaware that a large portion of it is never paid for at all. They are ignorant of the fact that some of America's most notable literary men were glad to accept editorial positions and to hold them long after they had made names for themselves. Consular appointments have furnished many with a means of subsistence, and not a few have labored in other professions to eke out an existence. The old saying that literature is a good staff but a poor crutch holds as good today as when it was first uttered.

Educational Reform

There are signs of an awakening in educational circles. For a generation or more the policy of schools, high and low, has been to encourage numbers without reference to anything else. Everything has been done to attract the crowd and to keep as many as possible as long as they could be coaxed to stay. To that end discipline has been not only relaxed but discarded, while the elective system and the play theory have eliminated the necessity for effort. The idea has been that learning should be converted into a pastime and that what the pupil did not care to exert himself to accomplish must be, in some subtle way, detrimental to his peculiar mentality. The result is obvious. We have established a royal road but unfortunately it does not lead to learning nor to anything else but petulant gratification of a momentary whim. The colleges, which have been overshadowing the secondary schools to such an extent that they have become only feeders instead of independent institutions, now complain that their own work is hampered and set back by the appalling ignorance of the new classes coming up, who know nothing whatever save the data required for matriculation; and Horace Greely's cynical classification of college graduates with "other horned cattle" takes on new significance every year when the batch of graduates is turned loose in the world of work. It has suddenly dawned upon the educational world that there is merit in discipline as well as in pleasure, and that the ability to buckle down to what is not highly enjoyable has its uses in this sublunary sphere. Not only have educationalists done their best in the past to make learning a process of unconscious assimilation; they have likewise given encouragement to the unfit. The growth of the athletic course has resulted in a premium being put on brawn, and many a husky youth qualified by nature for nothing higher than a blacksmith shop has been virtually paid to forsake his obvious destiny and lend his strength to the football team. The Nebraska State University is first in the field with a project for weeding out the undesirables, discouraging the toughs who are attracted only by athletic opportunities and the immunity enjoyed by "students" when they run amuck, as well as that class denominated "sissy-boys," who are intent only on making social acquaintances. A similar course of action might well be directed against the "co-eds" who, like their college brothers are too often bent on a good time without the exacting surveillance of more conventional society—hooligans, for the most part, who, as college "girls," albeit they are well advanced into womanhood, indulge themselves in antics which would bring ostracism upon saleswomen in any respectable shop.

A Chinese Idyll

Oh, Wing Tee Wee
Was a sweet Chinee,
And she lived in the town of Tac;
And her eyes were blue,
And her curling queue
Hung dangling down her back,
And she fell in love with gay Wan Sil,
Who wrote his love on a laundry bill.

And Ting Tung Told
Was a pirate bold,
And he sailed in a Chinese junk;
And he loved, ah, me!
Sweet Wing Tee Wee;
But his valiant heart had sunk:
So he drowned his woes in a sparkling "fizz,"
And he swore that the maid would yet be his.

So bold Ting Told
Showed all his gold
To the maid of the town of Tac;
And sweet Wing Wee
Eloped to sea
And never more came back;
For in far Chinese the maids are fair,
And the maids as false as they are elsewhere.

At the Play

Amid a multitude we sat alone,
By friendly half-lights screened from wondering gaze;
Hand clasped in hand we watched the stage ablaze
With rainbow fires—saw Richard to his throne
Stride through his kinsmen's blood, to lose at last Throne, life, and soul. What tragic forces swayed
This world in counterfeit. Yet undismayed,
Half in a dream we saw the scenes shift past;
And when the curtain fell upon the strife
We turned and smiled into each other's eyes
With unchecked love—as under broader skies,
When this strange pageantry which we call life
Has flitted by, somewhere we two shall sit.
Together, smiling at the close of it.

Four Books Made in Local Shops

With No Apologies Offered For Waxing Enthusiastic Over the Splendid Craft of Paul Elder and Alexander M. Robertson—a Rubaiyat That Gives Every Student a Chance to Participate in the Omar Controversy

By Edward F. O'Day

Here are four finished products of our local bookshops, beautiful testimonials to the artistry which Paul Elder and Alexander M. Robertson bring to their gentle craft.* They are volumes to be handled daintily, with careful fingers—the "observant thumb" would desecrate if it dared to leave its smudgy lines anywhere on their generous margins. It is a joy to turn them over and over and note their perfect beauties; from back to back, from title page to colophon, they show no flaw of editing or workmanship. Do we of San Francisco rightly appreciate this sort of book-making? Are we frank and quick in our recognition of the technical mastery displayed by the publishers within our gates or do we look for the names of the widely heralded houses of Europe and the East before we venture to place the seal of approval upon the volumes we buy? I am afraid that, to say the least, we have not been lavish in our praise of intramural book-craft; that we have rather taken it as a matter of course that Elder and Robertson should serve us so luxuriously in the literary wares to which they affix their names. Yet it should not be so. If it be provincially narrow to exalt the works of the parish merely because they are the works of our parish and not of another, it seems to me that an equal bigotry is shown in denying fine workmanship its due simply on account of a paltry fear that others may account us ridiculously circumscribed in our tastes. "A poor thing, but mine own" is a mean sentiment if mine own is equal to the best. Elder's and Robertson's craft in bookmaking are equal to the best anywhere; let us therefore fittingly acclaim it so.

Here is a new Omar that every enthusiast of the Rubaiyat will want to add to his collection. It is printed in clean type on wide-margined Italian handmade paper and bound in hand-made oriental boards. It has the sympathetic Gilbert James illustrations and is edited from Fitzgerald's final revisions by Arthur Guiterman who has added, for the benefit of students, a literal version of those quatrains of the original upon which Fitzgerald's poem was based.

That addition of the original quatrains was a happy thought. What Omar did for Fitzgerald and what Fitzgerald brought to Omar is a frayed topic of discussion; all that can be said about it has been reiterated many times. It is no stuff for controversy now. But there is a knottier problem about which the lovers of the "idle singer 'neath the blossomed bough" delight to wage their war of words and now that the original, literally construed, has been placed within reach of every student, all who will may form their opinion and range themselves on one or the other side of the argument. The dispute, of course, has to do with the interpretation of Omar's philosophy. Was he an idle singer or a serious-minded philosopher? Did he mean to flout all of the two-and-seventy jarring sects or are his sweetly flowing numbers the pretty covering beneath which an ascetic creed is hidden? Was the great Richard Burton right when he declared that Omar spiritualized Sufism and that he used "wine" in its mystic sense of entranced love for the Soul of Souls? Fitzgerald evidently did not think so; otherwise he would not have made Omar speak contemptuously of a "Sufi pipkin," (quatrain LXXXVII). The student, by reference to this new Elder edition, will find that the expression was not used in the original. Nicholas, one of the great French authorities on Omar, agrees with Burton and it was only recently that Mirza Ali Khuli-Khan lent the weight of his authority to the same side of the dispute; but then, of course, Mirza saw a vision in which Carmel-By-The-Sea had become the artistic hub of the universe; so he may not be an altogether reliable authority.

Without having delved too deeply into the question, I must confess to a predilection for the literal interpretation of Omar's rosy verses. I like to include him in that long line of poets who meant "wine" when they sang the grape and whose numbers flowed unequivocally "when the booze burned in the brain." It is a glorious succession which extends far into the mists of antiquity beyond Anacreon and will by no means come to an end with poor Louis Robertson. Omar is honored in this hierarchy and I see no reason to read interminably confusing esoteric meanings into his quatrains. If his was not a hedonistic philosophy I will not be bothered unravelling its true inwardness. I prefer Lucretius or Richard Burton whose Kasidah or "Lay of the Higher Law" is a greater achievement in the metrical exposition of a serious system. Rabelais' oracle of the bottle—"Drink!" might be inscribed on all of my Omars and I would not complain.

Robertson gives us another sort of publication. It has a distinctly local flavor; one of those books that should be in the library of every loyal San Franciscan. It is called "The City That Is" and it comes from the able pen of Rufus Steele, Sunday editor of the Call. It is a rare pleasure to praise the work of a friend and in this instance there is no need that friendship should eke out sincerity. Steele has handled the romance of our three years of rebuilding with a brilliant touch; he has cast over the story of steel and brick and mortar the spell of a poetic enthusiasm so that the heart throbs to the stirring details. Robertson has done justice to the author's work. The book is printed on a fine glazed paper in two colors and is illustrated with full-page half-tones of the city's rehabilitation. The binding is of Cadmus boards and the cover carries Rohrhand's striking design of St. Francis "loking for the scar," an illustration which appeared in a local newspaper and excited a great deal of favorable comment. The whole of "The City That Is" is beautifully done.

It was a happy thought of Edna S. Little to arrange the scriptural accounts of Christ's work in the form of a continuous narrative; the result is "The Works of Jesus." The Bible is too little read, either as an inspired testament or as a literary performance of transcendent beauty. A little compilation of this kind will attract readers who think of the Bible as a sacred but cumbersome volume opened at great intervals for the recording of births, marriages and deaths. It will convince them that aside from its religious significance the Bible is a good book to read and when once they have realized that, of course they will only be satisfied with the Gospels as a whole. It is a beautiful book, this of Miss Little's. It is bound in Fabriano boards and has as a frontispiece Da Vinci's picture of Christ, taken from the "Last Supper." I wonder how many, buying this gem of Elder's book-making, will read the entire Sermon on the Mount for the first time?

One other of Elder's books is before me, a new edition of a little Christmas book of verses entitled "You and

It is tastefully decorated by Will Jenkins and has as a frontispiece a photogravure of Hunter's "My Lady's Garden," one of the treasures of the great Tate Gallery of London. Miss Foster's stanzas are written "for occasions" and possess the merits which occasional pieces may boast; they are sentimental, sympathetic, tender, never deep or in the least disturbing. One stanza will illustrate:

"A Christmas might be Christmas
Without a thing to cook,
But, oh, the joyless Christmas
Without at least one book."

It will be noticed that Miss Foster is idealistic; nine families out of ten would relinquish the book for the cooking, if they had to choose their Christmas cheer in such a niggardly manner. But by all means let us have both the turkey and cranberry sauce and the good books, Miss Foster's or others.

The Palate for Novels

One makes discoveries about his changes of taste as time passes which bring a shock of surprise. Up to a certain period of life holiday times always embrace as one of their joys in store, when serious business ceases to be the first consideration, the prospect of reading at least several novels. No doubt it was always in contemplation that it would not be possible to continue reading even the best of novels without a break, unless perhaps one were a woman or a woman of a certain kind; still there was no difficulty in conceiving that the appetite would not be over-sated even after reading continuously say three or four novels. What has happened to us when the holiday comes round, and, having brought away our selection of novels, we find on sitting down to read that they have no interest for us? Analysis shows that the change is in ourselves. We recognize according to the external tests of criticism that the novels are not in any way below the literary standard which a fairly fastidious, but not too fastidious, taste demands. That is sufficiently ministered to. The explanation does not lie in any deficiency in that respect. As novels the books would have amused or interested or aroused our curiosity, but not now, and with a feeling of something like alarm we wonder whether we have outlived one more taste, and whether in the future we are to be deprived of another accustomed means of pleasure. This is a very serious matter for a man who is advancing to mature age, and who has felt his range of positive pleasures, as distinct from the capacity of enjoying comfort, growing more and more contracted. Is the romantic and the sentimental taste, which has for a considerable time ceased to find its gratification in the theatre, also to find the novel insipid and unstimulating to its palate? It is very dreadful if it must be so. The novel is the cheapest and most facilely comfortable form perhaps in which one can take enjoyment; and one would expect the combination of facile comfortableness and literary pleasure to make its appeal to us more persuasively as age advanced. But no; we find it does not and we can explain the fact in no other way than by a change in ourselves. It is not the novels that have deteriorated; not at least to the extent that it would be impossible to find something that would be for our market if we had not ceased somehow to be normal as we once reckoned normality. We search for comparisons, being convinced that for mental and emotional changes there is always an analogy or parallel to be found in the physical world. We recall the time when we could eat sweets with a relish, though we now very much prefer the savory, or speaking generally, the dry.

In reading it is as in eating and drinking; as youth departs the taste for the dry takes the place of the sweet. Who in middle life, if we take men at any rate, cares for the love motive of novels? Much does he prefer the story that deals with facts bare of emotion. It may be history, or biography, or science in some of its multifarious forms, but not the conventional romance of the callow youth and maiden, that he cares to read; though perhaps intellectual curiosity may even die out to such a lamentable extent that the daily newspaper may come to provide all the information the man of advancing years cares for. If novels are read at all by such a one they will be the older novels, and especially those of novelists such as Thackeray and Trollope; neither of whom was good at what is called the love interest. Anything but that the mature man can put up with. Women tolerate it longer, but a man becomes convinced long before a woman does that the love interest is as secondary in importance in the novel as it is in life itself. When a man has passed through the cycle of emotions called love he has had his adventures; other people's cease to have a personal bearing and he anticipates nothing further from them. It is not so with the young man or woman who, as the proverb says of the young bear, have all their troubles before them. The world of love, so full of mystery for them, has become to the maturer man translated into the concrete terms of domestic life and the relations of man and woman pass into the domain of fact that can be tested by experience. Yet novelists do not seem to understand this psychology of the mature man, and they continue to make the love story their chief staple; so that they are read chiefly by young men and women as callow as their own heroes and heroines. Pecuniarily they are of course catering for a larger market; the number of the immature by age and the immature by nature are always the larger part of mankind. But whatever may be said of the educated woman, the ordinary man becomes sooner out of touch with the insipidities of the conventional novel than the ordinary woman; and it is for the woman more than for the man that most novelists appear to cater. They probably do so because for the most part they themselves are very much on the same mental level as their readers. The higher class shirk the inanities of the love story: Scott; Thackeray, and Trollope have all recorded the repugnance with which they approached that part of their story in which they had to work out the love-making: it was positively nauseous to them. They were mature themselves and had exhausted their emotions in that line: and their mature readers are in touch with them. The mature man asks for a presentment and a criticism of the kind of life he now lives and that his friends live who are engaged in what they take to be serious affairs, where the possibilities of the future are not sentimental but practical. Or he asks for pure adventure which frankly gets outside of ordinary life. One wants to read of things which he can test by experience, or of things which lie altogether out of his experience and which therefore do not stir the critical faculty to protest against a parody of the life he himself knows at a stage when, as he thinks, life in its only real sense can be said to have begun. Men marvel more and more at the complexity and richness of human nature and life as they grow older. Imaginative representations grow ever more and more inadequate and even futile to them; they have an increased consciousness of the deficiency and a growing impatience with the efforts of blunderers to reproduce a world that is infinite. Genius only can make efforts which do not seem ludicrous attempts at the impossible. And men of genius like the late Mr. Meredith, for example, conceal the inadequacy of their creative reproduction by brilliant criticisms which refer us rather to life as we know it in our own experience and reflection than as they give it us in their characters. We prefer his thoughts on love in its mystical sense as the basis of life, to the adventures of his young lovers, as to whom and whose doings the most that can be said is that they and other novelists' lovers are a crude symbolism of that love. In short the palate gets finer as we advance in life, and it becomes harder to find exactly the flavor and body that pleases it.

The Master Glassworker

By Augusta De Wit (From the Dutch)

The great shop of Graffi, a treasure-house of the richest Venetian glass, is ablaze with the noonday glare. The row of mirrors along the wall is turned to a flood of pure light, forming a soft white radiance on either side of a fountain that sends up its trembling, sunlit spray. The gold of the mosaics flames. Among the glittering crystal hang swarms of sparks, dazzling in color and motionless.

All the windows are open. Without lies the glory of Venice and the June sky. From the glowing zenith, blue as blue fire, still more brilliant light comes streaming in. The blazing Piazza throws back its sharp, fitful colors into the shop: a wealth of purple and many-tinted mosaic from the basilica, with dashes of gold radiating from the cupolas; the reddish yellow and brilliant orange of sunbeams; and above these the white dazzle of the Procuratia Nuova, resembling some white summer cloud filled with sunlight. And between the splendor of city and sky lies the emporium of vitric art, like the burning heart of a jewel flooded with the sparkle of its own thousand-fold broken light.

Within there is a restless glitter of purple, blue and emerald glass, of clear flame-jets burning at the points of multitudinous crystals, of iridescent rays in the beveled edges of the mirrors. In shadowy spaces, softer mother-of-pearl colors float about like thin soap-bubble films; inexpressibly soft tints of opalescent glass hang trembling between the broken, harsher colors of the mosaics. Up above hang the crystal chandeliers, like a transparent mist darkened in places to a smoky brown. And whenever all this floating crystal is gently swayed by a draft from the door sharp glints of light shoot through it in every direction.

The manager of the factory himself conducts a couple of notable strangers through the throng of visitors and customers—a gentleman with a rosette in his buttonhole and an expression of diplomatic reserve on his face, and a blond, girlish woman who looks about her with something like rapt amazement. Slowly they hove through all that soft and vivid glitter. The young woman, with a motion of the hand, as if she were plucking flowers for a bouquet, takes an object here and there from the brilliant rows—a vase luxuriantly covered with strange colored blossoms on a twisted stem; a beaker clutched in the golden claws of a dragon-shape with fiery red wings; a filmy ewer of gossamer glass, in which drops of light hang suspended like dew in the silvery threads of a spider's web; small wings that seem cast out of molten jewels. But ever more and more beautiful things attract her gaze—innumerable curious forms of beauty, countless tints, clear and soft, of that noble Venetian glass which seems the product of the three primary elements—of transparent water, serene air and purest fire; which is like a thing of still life, the wonder-growth of that wonder-isle—bells and bubbles rising out of the dark green waters of the sluggish canals, dream-blossoms of the lagoons; restless, changing beauty caught from the shimmer of the sunlight upon the foam of the sea, and blossoming forth under the protection of the marble seawall. And into some vessels the red and orange of passionate evening skies have trickled down, while others have closed their leaves over a glint of the moonlight that lies peacefully upon the voiceless streams. Over there hang chandeliers of clear, pale yellow and opalescent glass, crystal branches twisted in bundles and twigs drooping in bending shapes, on whose tips the yellow-red blossoms seem ready to open in the wax-light. Here are mirrors that seem pellucid springs rippling between a stark inclosure of ice in the midst of a brilliant glitter of needles and cones and white-ground sherds. And, added to all, in solid forms, among all that filmy transparence, the harsh splendor of mosaics; a display of jewels and brocade-colors on a golden background, of aureoles formed with rubies, emeralds and sapphires strung together about the staring-eyed faces of saints, their motionless forms enfolded in splendid raiment, stiff with gold.

The young woman moved among it all as in a dream, halting, happy, half blinded. But suddenly she stopped and cried:

"Oh! What is this?"

In a glass case, locked and barred as in a safe, she caught the sparkle of a dark blue object. A proud smile lit the face of the manager as he answered:

"The chef-d'oeuvre of our collection. It has been purchased for one of the royal palaces; but we have permission to keep it on exhibition for a while yet."

He took the article from behind its protecting doors. It was a beaker, glistening dully, with rough surface, and heavy as a lump of ore; in the shadow a dark, rough piece of welded metal and glass; in the light, a splendid radiance of silver. Azure crystals covered its sides and base with a mottled sheen, like that of roughly ground sapphires to which still cling the damp and darkness of the black mines.

Carefully the manager placed the beaker full in the light, and a blue nimbus stood out against the white of the marble table on which it had been placed. Then the dull crystals began to sparkle with ever-changing light, and out of the black depths of the beaker's heart seemed to well up the richest of azure.

The visitor took the beaker into his hands and critically observed the heavy, almost clumsy shape of the dark glass, crusted over with thin lines of silver and set with bulging crystals. A bit of glass and a spangle of silver—that seemed all. But as he looked the magic spell began afresh, and amazement took hold of him. It was not a thing of the now and here, not Venetian glass that only yesterday came finished from the hands of the workman. It must be a relic from long forgotten times and lands unknown.

Among all that splendid glasswork, suddenly become cheap and common, among all that group of tourists, the beaker shone forth like a vision out of the Orient—out of the luxurious, cruel, terrible Asia of the Crusaders. It seemed like some lost jewel of a Saladin's treasure, for which robbers had lain in wait with long, patient cunning; clutched in bloody fists it had been dragged from one blazing camp to another, wheresoever the Crusaders' standards waved. For many silent weeks it

Rudolph In His Tantrums

"I blame the Call as much as anything else for this," exclaimed the Hon. Rudolph Spreckels as soon as he learned that his thrifty little prosecutor had suffered defeat at the hands of the long-suffering public. Which shows that the Spreckels habit of tainting the air with the fetid and frayed family linen is strong even in defeat; which also indicates the trend of the illustrious patriot's mind. Eager for Heney's election not only for the purposes of the graft prosecution but also for possible emergencies in the contest over his father's will, he was sensible of the fact that his brother John D. was not unconscious of the undesirability of augmenting the forces of his enemy by contributing to his juridical stronghold a district attorney of the same red-rubber stamp qualities that distinguish his personal assets of the bench. Naturally he suspected the Call of having experienced a change of heart since the opening of the will contest, and certainly it was apparent that the Call was lukewarm in the campaign so far as Heney was concerned. Personally Mr. John D. Spreckels was opposed to Heney, but Mr. Spreckels, though nominally the proprietor of the Call has been precluded by reason of a contract with the business manager of the paper from dictating the policy of his eccentric journal in all matters. He could do nothing more for Heney's opponent than secure for him half decent treatment, but that was enough to enrage the inflammable Rudolph who ordered the Boughten Bulletin to swat his brother's paper and swat it hard. The pusillanimous Call meekly took the kicking, but obtained and published a certificate of character from Heney, who was afraid that if he did not supply it on demand the paper would come out for his opponent.

The Spreckels Temper

The Hon. Rudolph Spreckels is not a graceful loser. Defeat stifles him with impassioned grief. Never to him are the uses of adversity at all sweet. He knows nothing of the despair that makes victims sometimes victors. A man of strong primal passions and imperious will the only justification for which is the fortune he inherited, troubled thoughts stir the hell within him and cause him to rage and tear like the proverbial bull in a china shop. In the strenuous game of life everything must go Rudolph's way or he wont play. This unpleasant characteristic was exemplified early in the campaign much to the disgust of some of the curious reformers of the Good Government League. At a conference one day a proposition made by Mr. Spreckels was not received favorably, and he fumed ferociously and striking an inoffensive desk with his fist made the startling announcement that he would vote for P. H. McCarthy.

His Premier Stunt

Mr. Spreckels' first appearance in public life was as a member of the Committee of Fifty appointed by Mayor Schmitz to bring order out of chaos after the fire. As a member of this committee Mr. Spreckels evinced the same whole-hog-or-none tendency that makes his society somewhat undesirable. He was strongly opposed to the proposition to permit the United Railroads to resume the street car service, but one day the cars were started and all the people rejoiced at this manifestation of the big corporation's confidence in the future of the city. The next day the cars were stopped. Everybody wanted to know why. They were stopped at Mr. Spreckels' behest. He told the Committee of Fifty that an engineer employed by him had reported that the trollery wires had not been properly insulated and that there was great danger of another conflagration. Thereupon Gavin McNab conducted an investigation the result of which was that the committee again granted permission for the operation of the car system. Mr. Spreckels immediately resigned in a huff. This was the first ebullition of his hatred of Patrick Calhoun.

A Session of the Uplifters

Not the least interesting feature of the "Sunday of Justice" was the speech of the Rev. Politicus Whangbible. "What we need; what we demand; what we shall have," said the pious orator in impassioned tones, "is the preservation of the purity of our women, the moral uplift of the family." At this point the Hon. James D. Phelan, emerging from his whiskers, rose to his full height on his hind feet and brayed sonorously, "This shall be my sacred charge in the future, as it has been in the past." The Rev. Politicus Whangbible looked reproachfully at Mr. Phelan and resumed: "In the name of the great American people"—Hiram Johnson entering at this moment solemnly declared, "The American people is here. I am the American people. I have just finished my daily devotion of holding up my hands to the jungles of Africa." Recollecting himself with an effort the Rev. Politicus Whangbible resumed: "Oh for the second coming"—Another interruption. Mr. Heney arose with characteristic humility. "Ecce Deus. It has happened." A number of very truthful ladies in the audience affirmed that they saw an aura not less than six feet in diameter framing Mr. Heney's great head. At this moment the Rev. Politicus Whangbible attempted to say something, and stumbling over his own tongue, became speechless. The Pharisees pronounced it a miracle.

Hearst and Heney

Now that the campaign is over the observation may not be taken amiss that many people are trying to account for the Examiner's attitude toward Mr. Heney. Some time ago it was reported that the great Chameleon of journalism and Proteus of politics had given orders to his San Francisco lieutenants to deal impartially with the graft prosecution, and it was explained that as a result of the proselytizing of his rivals, who had availed themselves of the fanaticism systematically propagated in this enlightened city, he had lost many subscribers and was fearful of losing more. It was rather astonishing that such an explanation should emanate from the office of a rich and powerful journalist, who has been regarded by his admirers as a man of principle not to be influenced by threats or moved by any sordid considerations; but this and no other explanation was given. Now the question is being asked, What else was responsible for Mr. Hearst's change of policy? for it became apparent during the campaign that the Examiner was doing something more than pursuing religiously a policy of impartiality. Ingeniously and disingenuously the Examiner supported the man, who some months ago was denouncing Mr. Hearst as the hired agent of the higher-ups, and who was held up by Mr. Hearst to public obloquy, vituperated by him on the public platform, derided and scoffed at in the Examiner and called upon to answer charges of dishonesty.

A Great Story

In the recent campaign the Examiner was more effective in Mr. Heney's behalf than any of his frank and avowed champions, for by its affectation of impartiality and disinterestedness it deceived many people. Some day we shall probably learn how Mr. Hearst was whipped into line and doubtless it will prove an interesting story. Mr. Hearst is known to be a very good hater. He has reason according to his lights to hate Mr. Heney, and it is hardly reasonable to suppose that he conceived it to be advantageous to his paper to aid the Spreckels puppet by the practice of dissimulation. It would have been more characteristic of him to employ the arts of dissimulation to punish his enemy. That there is a distinct subterraneous understanding between Mr. Hearst and the little coterie of the prosecution cabal may be inferred from the circumstance that the baiting of the Examiner's proprietor is no longer the pastime of the paid retainers of the uplift outfit. Nothing more is said of Mutt. Has he been forgiven? Or has his employer been blackmailed into submission?

"Sir," said the prisoner, "I did not pay this man for my refreshments because I know nothing of the value of money. I am a child of genius."

"And what is your age?" asked the justice.

"Forty-two years."

"Then it is time you were weaned," and his Honor gave him thirty days away from the bottle.

"The Woman With the Serpent's Tongue"

The newspapers, in reprinting William Watson's recently published poetical diatribe, hint darkly at the identity of the woman who has aroused him to such fierce animosity. While the poem breathes a "saeva indignatio" worthy of Swift, it is not on account of its literary merit that it has excited widespread interest. Apparently everybody who is anybody in London knows just what woman Watson had in mind when he dipped his pen in gall and it is the fidelity of the characterization together with the daring of the poet in making the invective public which elevate "The Woman With the Serpent's Tongue" to the dignity of a nine-days' wonder. Veiled gossip seems to fix on Mrs. Herbert Asquith, wife of the prime minister of Great Britain, as the original of Watson's verses. If this be true, then Watson has revealed a side of that remarkable woman's character which may be commonplace to the initiates of London society but which has never before been bared to those of us who, no matter how far removed we may be from the circles in which Mrs. Asquith moves, have still heard much of her peculiar beauty, her captivating personality, her inimitable wit and her brilliant career. If gossip be correct, if Mrs. Asquith be in truth the original of Watson's scathing sketch, I am sorry to be disillusioned, for in all that I have read of her there has been no hint of the darker shades which the poet has thrown across his picture. If Mrs. Asquith has a piosoned tongue, if she sneers at worthiness and blackens the characters of the dead, if she is incapable of friendship and cherishes insatiable ambition; then all those who have written of her have carefully toned down her character to make it alluringly feminine, full of the fascination of childlike irresponsibility, and in so doing have confessed that art may not paint with the bewildering contradiction of coloring used by nature.

The Original of Dodo

For years Mrs. Asquith has been the pet of London society. Emma Alice Margaret Tennant was her maiden name but her friends knew her as "Margot" and when Benson made her the heroine of his well-known book he thinly disguised this nickname by calling her "Dodo." She was the daughter of Sir Charles Tennant, the head of a great chemical concern which long boasted the loftiest chimney in Scotland. Gladstone liked his daughter so much that he made the chemist a baronet and a trustee of the British Museum. One of Sir Charles' other daughters married Stanley, the great African explorer. From her earliest entrance into London society Margot Tennant was conspicuous and influential, but when E. F. Benson, the clever son of the former archbishop of Canterbury, made her the heroine of a novel which became the best seller of a former generation, her fame became international. "Dodo" was something of a shock to a novel-reading public which had not yet cultivated a taste for the highly-seasoned fiction dished out today, but it was undeniably a clever, well-written book and would have become popular even if it had lacked the adventitious interest attaching to the scarcely-hidden personality of its chief character. If examined in connection with Meredith's "Diana of the Crossways" it would supply one of those remarkable instances of parallelism which are so often charged to plagiarism. Also it suggests Robert Hichens' "Green Carnation" on account of the clever nonsense with which it is crammed; no wonder Benson was suspected of having written the satire on Oscar Wilde—he was capable of it.

She Founded "The Souls"

Speaking of Oscar Wilde brings me to that curious group which Margot Tennant founded and which, by the name of "The Souls," was first internationally famous and then narrowly escaped becoming infamous. Oscar Wilde was a member of this eclectic association, although his name is rarely connected with it nowadays; so were Arthur Balfour, George Wyndham, Beerbohm Tree, Alfred Lyttleton, Mrs. Tree, Lady Granby and Lord Elcho. It was a gathering of intellectual brilliants of the most intensive cultivation; men and women who met in musky drawing rooms to utter pale paradox and purple epigram. But in the pursuit of estheticism it very nearly developed a great public scandal and when some of its members were threatened with destruction in the Oscar Wilde debacle, it crumbled to pieces. Only within a short time it has been revived in England and already the breath of scandal blows upon it.

Some of Margot's Friends

The greatest men in Europe have esteemed it a favor to enjoy the friendship of Margot. She is a personal acquaintance of the Czar and the Kaiser. Once when the Kaiser was in London she made a wager that she would force him to speak to her and by a clever maneuver she succeeded in doing so while riding in Rotten Row. So pleased was he with the acquaintance that he waltzed several times with her at the state ball in Buckingham Palace. Gladstone and Tennyson were also her intimate friends. She was the life and soul of the celebrated yachting party organized for Gladstone's diversion when he visited Copenhagen and had his interview with the Czar. Tennyson who was a very vain man, was bored throughout the trip; and even now Mrs. Asquith tells of the rivalry which existed between the two grand old men, the one anxious to talk all the time and the other equally desirous to read aloud his favorite productions, until their fellow-passengers became so weary that they would glide softly away, leaving the statesman perorating in solitary grandeur at one end of the ship and the laureate declaiming from the Idylls at the other. Always the fair Margot has been the favorite of the old and wise; her quizzical repartee frightens the unlicked cubs of society.

What Margot Looks Like

Photography, I have been told, is unjust to the contour of Mrs. Asquith's face; even words seem inadequate to describe her beauty. Her eyes, her nose, her cheeks, her chin, and the trick of her tongue in protruding timidly between immaculate teeth have frequently baffled paragraphers. The eyes are mischievous; when she is serious, gray as squirrels, but when she laughs, deeply and pellucidly blue. Fine eyebrows are matched by long sweeping golden eyelashes. Her skin is as white, as satiny, as translucent as a baby's; the fact that it remains today, when she is no longer a young woman, rosy and unwrinkled, has given rise to many stories but it is asserted positively by those who know that she never resorts to paint or powder. Her complexion is the result of plenty of cream and porridge when she was in the nursery; also of her regular hours—until the age of nineteen she was never up after nine o'clock at night and even now it is a matter of usual importance which takes her out of bed before ten in the morning. But it is really her expression which makes Margot irresistible. Her nose is inconsequential and critics have objected to the size and shape of her mouth; they have said that her chin is "too saucy." But the face as a whole is inexpressibly ravishing in its perpetual transitions from grave to gay, from what one admirer has styled "the divine wistfulness of a Monna Lisa to the contagious hilarity of a Beatrice."

Is She Watson's Subject?

As I have said, there has never been any hint of the forbidding qualities with which Watson endows his woman of the serpent's tongue, in what I have hitherto read of Mrs. Asquith. It is true that in "Dodo" she is represented as superbly egotistic, incapable of conjugal or maternal love and morally irresponsible; but these qualities lose their repellant aspect when joined to her Gallic vivacity, her aptitude for talking clever nonsense and her wonderful fascination of character. For the rest it has been written of her that she is a splendid amateur actress, excelling equally in Ophelia and in ingenue roles; that she is a matchmaker with a dozen successful unions to her credit; and that she has set the fashions for London season after season. Can she be the woman "who slights the worthiest in the land, sneers at the just, condemns the brave and blackens goodness in its grave?" It seems well nigh impossible and I would be more than inclined to doubt it, had not the dispatches pointed so plainly to her as Watson's original.

Margot's Style of Witty Nonsense

In order that readers may form some idea of the sort of charm which attaches to Mrs. Asquith's conversation, I will quote some of it as given by Benson in "Dodo." It must be remembered that Benson hit the mark so well that everybody who read his book knew immediately whose picture he was drawing.

"That's profane, but it's only out of the Catechism. Who wrote the Catechism? I always regard the Catechism as only a half-sacred work, and so profanity doesn't count; at least, you may make two profane remarks out of the Catechism, which will only count as one.

"Mrs. Vivian comes tomorrow. You must be awfully good to her, and take her to see all the drunken idlers in the village. That will be dear of you. It's just what she likes. She has a sort of passion for drunken cabmen who stamp on their wives. If you stamped on me a little every evening she would cultivate you to any extent. Shall I lie down on the floor for you to begin?

"Don't you like pate? Of course one's very sorry for the poor, diseased goose with a bad inside, but there are so many other things to think about besides diseased geese that it doesn't signify much.

Edith? I think it makes one feel Sunday-like. I have found two dreadfully nice lessons. I forgot the Bible was such a good book. I think I shall go on with it. One of them is about the bones in Ezekiel which were very dry.

"Have some tea and give me another kidney—two, I think. What happens to the sheep after they take its kidneys out? Do you suppose it dies? I wonder if they put india-rubber kidneys in? Kidneys do come from sheep, don't they? Or is there a kidney-tree? Kidneys look like a kind of mushroom and I suppose the bacon is the leaves.

William Watson's Poetry

If the startling "Woman With the Serpent's Tongue" serves the purpose of calling wider attention to Watson's poetical worth, it will not have been written in vain. Watson is one of those singers from whom timid readers are alienated when they hear that he is a "literary poet." I imagine the critic who applied that phrase to Watson had never gone further in his volume than the first two poems, "Wordsworth's Grave" and "Shelley's Centenary." It is true that Watson has devoted himself less than most poets to the passion of love, preferring to sing the songs that are inspired by patriotism, the love of nature, especially in its grander manifestations, like the mountains and the sea; and that he has delighted to do honor to the masters of his craft who have gone before him. But if there is a greater poet writing in English today, it would be interesting to see his claims presented, if only for purposes of comparison. Watson's verses show a cultivated mind working with inspiration and technical mastery on splendid subjects. His ideals are lofty and clothed in the language of dignity; the reason, it may be, why he is not better known. Only the sincere lover of poetry appreciates a poet who never stoops to the meretricious themes that are so popular at present; and Watson must be read with the mind alert for beauties, as he is no cultivator of the obvious. It has often been said that if the laureate crown were awarded in England strictly on poetical merit, it would have been given to Watson; certainly he would grace that position, instead of making it ridiculous, as Alfred Austin has done. In one of his epigrams Watson writes:

> In youth the artist voweth lover's vows
> To Art, in manhood maketh her his spouse.
> Well if her charms yet hold for him such joy
> As when he craved some boon and she was coy.

It will be to Watson's lasting credit that he has never put away Art, his chosen spouse; that he has been faithful to her through many years; that he has served her with modesty and humility, giving her the best of which he was capable; and always striving to make that best still better. Of how many contemporary poets can the same be said?

Wheeler in Berlin

News comes to me from far-away Berlin of that eminent educator Benjamin Ide Wheeler, the Hyperion of Berkeley who is now giving light to the benighted mortals of Germany. To be more explicit, Dr. Wheeler is now edifying the Germans in a course of lectures refulgent with information pertaining to the broad topic of human progress on this continent. This is a subject that Berkeley's beacon light of culture has specialized in. He knows his America as the Arab knows the desert. So far as the realities of American life are concerned Dr. Wheeler is no doctrinaire. He is intensely practical and keenly observant. He is a good mixer, and in his quest of knowledge he plays no favorite. The intimate friend of Mr. Roosevelt when that gentleman was in power, at the same time he fawned upon Mr. Harriman in the interest of sociological research. A purist in politics, he cultivated the friendship of Mr. Ruef when the unspeakable one was at the zenith of his glory, and conferences between them were of frequent occurrence at late and unusual hours when the virtuous were wrapped in slumber and only Belial's sons were abroad. So the overlord of Berkeley will be worth while to the Germans.

Headlong Into Print

As a purveyor of information Dr. Wheeler is not confining himself while abroad to the lecture platform. Even in Germany it appears he has not lost that characteristic boyish dash, that excessive predisposition to action that leads to precipitancy and the public prints. Dr. Wheeler is a man of strong and tenacious habits. To strip him of his habits would be to flay him alive. Consequently in Berlin as in Berkeley he retains the authoritative air of the dogmatic schoolmaster, and talks oracularly for publication. The occasion of his appearance in German print was a statement by Professor Lamprecht, the learned Leipsic historian, to the effect that German universities no longer lead the universities of the world. This statement was made in the course of a lecture. It was the statement of a scholar who has had some experience of universities throughout Europe. This statement Dr. Wheeler of Berkeley, philologist, versed in seven languages but unable to hold his tongue in any one of them, seized upon as a pretext for aerating his views and challenging the rationality of the distinguished historian's. "It is not a question of better or best," said our illustrious pedant, presuming without apparent rhyme or reason to set up a thesis of his own; "where universities are concerned it is a question of which is better adapted for the work it has in hand as constituted for it by social conditions."

The Wheeler Idea

When Professor Lamprecht read the interview with Dr. Wheeler he probably felt like saying to the gentleman from Berkeley as Socrates did to Polus, "My friend, of course you are right, but will you explain what you mean, as you are not intelligible." But probably Professor Lamprecht has been kept busy conjecturing what the American idea of a university really is. To add to the German scholar's perplexity Dr. Wheeler observed incidentally, "Long ago I gave up drawing comparisons between things that are not essentially comparable." Thus was Professor Lamprecht soundly rebuked for postulating that universities are essentially akin and assuming that they have in common the general purpose of educating the young. German scholars still believe that a university in its elemental idea is the same as it was in the centuries when Athens drew to her bosom the youth of Europe and sent them back to the business of life. Dr. Wheeler will undertake during his sojourn in Berlin to dissipate the fallacy abiding there in academic circles, that universities should strive to cultivate the public mind and raise the intellectual tone of society. The scholars of Berlin are way behind the illuminati of Berkeley. The idea of a university adapting itself to social conditions instead of endeavoring to improve them, will strike the average German scholar as a bit of mischievous heterodoxy, but Dr. Wheeler will explain the importance of provincialism in all universities. He will point out that it is all wrong to suppose that education is a debt due from the present to future generations; that on the contrary education should be designed to fit men for the duties pertaining to their immediate selfish and material welfare, and to that end that universities should aim to deter men from becoming anything but creatures of their environment.

His Pregnant Laugh

Dr. Wheeler has made the announcement accompanied by a laugh that before leaving Germany he will discuss the subject of the American press. The Wheeler laugh is said to be pregnant with significance but hard to construe. It has a cold glitter as of ice. Why Dr. Wheeler should have laughed when he announced his intention of lecturing on the American press, it would be folly at this distance from the seat of his facial disturbance to conjecture. Having received no authoritative description of the laugh that accompanied the important announcement I can be sure of nothing save that it did not resemble the crackling of thorns under a pot; whether it was the grin Syncrusian or the horse-laugh sardonic or the subtle smile ironic, it will be impossible to determine before receiving information about the lecture. Meanwhile it is to be hoped that Dr. Wheeler has no intention of censuring the American press, for journalism in this country today is largely in the hands of university men. The tendencies of our university system are saliently exemplified in the press. The great American exponent of yellow journalism is a university man. Nearly all the leading editors and magazine writers are university men. Many of the magazine shriekers are university professors. The American press which is today forming the social conditions to which our universities, in Dr. Wheeler's opinion, should be adapted, is a subject that the eminent pedagogue should discuss cautiously and with no external symptoms of levity.

The Execution of Ferrer

It is not the fault of the radical politicians of Europe that the execution of Francisco Ferrer, the Spanish anarchist, has so far failed to develop into an "affaire" similar to the Dreyfus case. No means of inflaming popular sentiment against the government of Spain has been neglected. Anti-clericals, anarchists, republicans and anti-militarists in Spain, Italy, France and England have tried Ferrer on the platform and in their newspaper organs and after triumphantly acquitting him, have invoked vengeance for his blood upon the head of King Alfonso. They have declared that his conviction before the military tribunal was secured by the use of forged evidence; that his death was forced by the Spanish clericals who dreaded his influence upon the youth of Spain; and that his execution has made revolution inevitable. The United States has caught the contagious fever and many of our papers have joined in the denunciation of the Spanish government for condemning Ferrer to death. As the American police authorities have at times dealt with anarchists, notably Emma Goldman, in the most arbitrary fashion, particularly after the assassination of President McKinley, it may seem inconsistent that so much hostile criticism should be leveled at Spain; but consistency fades before partisan hatred and even journals noted for their cold-blooded weighing of both sides of every controversy have lost their head when dealing with the Ferrer case. Thus we find the New York Evening Post speaking of "the deplorable folly and blindness that were responsible for the execution of Ferrer" and stating, without proof of any kind, that he was not given a fair trial. One of the subtlest means of arousing sympathy for Ferrer and animosity toward his executioners has been the institution of comparisons between the Spanish anarchist and Tolstoy. The esteem in which Tolstoy is held among the Anglo-Saxons and the Slavs, it has been said, is similar to that which Ferrer enjoyed among the Latins.

Some Facts About Ferrer

The ingenuousness of absolute truth-telling is not to be looked for among men who have been excited by the military execution of their leader and it is well to delve deeply into the case before blaming the Spanish authorities for the course which they pursued. Ferrer used his wealth in establishing what have been called "lay schools" for the youth of Spain and it is usually charged that the clericals hated him on that account. But that a "lay school" in Spain is not precisely the same as a lay school in the United States may be gathered from Ferrer's own description of the purpose of his various foundations: "to make children reflect upon the lies of religion, of government, of patriotism, of justice, of politics, and of militarism, and to prepare their brains for the social revolution." How long would the inculcation of such destructive views meet with favor in this land of freedom? Ferrer's defenders have laid stress upon the fact that he was a philosophical anarchist and that he deprecated all violence; yet Current Literature, although inclined to be sympathetic with his admirers, admits that there is a "suspicious nebulosity" in his theorizing relative to the right of the oppressed to assassinate a monarch and that his essays on this dangerous subject were more than once confiscated by the police. Let it not be forgotten that among the people employed by Senor Ferrer in the school he conducted in Barcelona was Morral, the infamous ruffian who attempted to assassinate the King and Queen of Spain on their coronation day. When Alfonso was last the target of an anarchist bomb Ferrer was arrested, but the inconclusiveness of the evidence against him lead to his speedy release. In view of these facts the charge made against Ferrer by the Spanish authorities that his schools taught revolutionary violence and that the reign of terror in Barcelona was the direct consequence of these teachings is not without plausibility, to say the least.

Unfair Criticism of Spain

It might be thought that international courtesy, such as exists between the chancelleries of two nations, would prompt politicians to start with the assumption that Spain knew better than they what was the best course to pursue toward Ferrer, but they have not shown this common fairness. The anti-clericals of Italy and France have been particularly rabid in inveighing against the Vatican as the cause of Ferrer's execution, though it is well known that the Pope appealed to Alfonso for clemency. Of all the papers which I have seen the Saturday Review of London alone suggests that Spain pursued the course of justice in dealing with Ferrer. "So far as French protests are concerned," says this paper, "there is not the slightest reason for believing that Senor Ferrer would have had a fairer trial or more lenient treatment in France. In a state of siege accused persons are tried and dealt with by military methods. If Senor Ferrer was guilty, it cannot be contended that his sentence was otherwise than deserved. If he was guilty, he has been stirring up the people of Barcelona to change their government by violent means which actually resulted in death and disorder. People who embark on propaganda of this nature are well aware that they take their life in their hands; if they fail they must expect to pay the penalty. If the ministry intended to protect public order effectually there was no course but the one adopted. It is alleged, of course, that the trial was unfair, but that is not a matter on which outsiders, certainly not foreigners, have any means of judging. There is no reason at all for supposing that the evidence against Ferrer was otherwise than convincing. He was clearly very well defended, and the case was carefully reviewed by the military governor, and finally by the Cabinet, who must have weighed in the balance all the possibilities of prejudice being created in foreign and friendly countries if the sentence were enforced."

The Menace of Anarchy

One of Ferrer's associates was Lerroux, a member of the Spanish Parliament. Of Lerroux the secretary of the Spanish society of "Spanish Labor Solidarity" declared at the Ferrer mass meeting in Paris: "It is the republican party of Lerroux which stirred up the Barcelona movement." That Lerroux would be the last in the world to disavow this responsibility is evident from the following interview which he gave to the Matin's correspondent in London: "Spain is ripe for revolution. The events of Barcelona prove it. So my friends and I are going to begin again as soon as possible an energetic revolutionary propaganda. . . . Yes, I know you will ask me, What do you do with humanitarian principles? A revolution is sure to bring with it the shedding of blood. Unfortunately, this is only too true. But if we have the army on our side, we may hope to reach our end without too much bloodshed. We do not desire a bloody revolution—a guillotining revolution. But what do a few lives count when there is question for an entire people to shake off the yoke that enslaves it and to conquer its liberty?" Such utterances as there should give pause to those sentimentalists who are disposed at first blush to sympathize with the view that Ferrer's execution was a judicial murder. Ferrer kept very bad company and the old adage may be applied to him. Those who denounce his executioners are undeniably pulling chestnuts out of the fire for the anarchists and extreme socialists; just as those whose hearts go out to him on account of his "lay schools" are undoubtedly—though in many cases ignorantly—indorsing the creed of "neither God nor master" which the anarchists and extreme socialists are teaching.

How Hotaling Was Outwitted

Those who have seen—and it is hard not to see—the immense electric sign which proclaims from the slope of Nob Hill the virtues of a celebrated beer, may not know that Dick Hotaling feels personally aggrieved every time he looks at it. Not that Hotaling takes offense at the lack of artistic beauty in this huge advertisement or that he disapproves of the particular brew which it celebrates, but simply because its being there at all is due to the fact that he had "one put over on him," to use a vulgar but expressive phrase. Hotaling happens to own the property on which the sign has been erected and when the agents of the beer in question came to him to negotiate the lease of the property for advertising purposes, it immediately occurred to him that his own mercantile house had a beer of its own which might profit by that sort of exploitation. So he refused to make terms and put Shakespeare out of his head long enough to set about evolving a striking advertisement for this point of vantage. Meanwhile the agent, in no wise discouraged, employed a stranger to negotiate a lease of the property and when the stranger called around, he offered such tempting terms that Hotaling decided that the location was too valuable for advertising purposes and closed the deal. Of course nothing was said about beer signs, either by the stranger or by himself; what was his chagrin, therefore, when electricians began the erection of the huge electric trade mark. Hotaling has not been so unhappy since Henry Miller consigned him to the "unfortified city of Oakland."

Renaud Goes to the Chronicle

As one of those who scan the dailies religiously for the rare scintillations of wit, the scanty gleams of humor and the few-and-far-between flashes of literary style that lighten the gloom of the local newspaper output, I am always glad to proclaim a journalistic step in the right direction. One of these steps has been taken by the managing editor of the Chronicle and another by Ralph E. Renaud, erstwhile dramatic critic of the Bulletin. The two steps in the right direction have brought these two gentlemen, not into collision, but to an understanding which has its visible sign in the brightening of the dramatic pages of the Chronicle. In simple terms, Renaud has quit the Bulletin for the Chronicle and is serving his brilliant views of things theatrical on a larger and more appreciative circle of readers. I am mighty glad of it. An afternoon newspaper is a poor medium for a writer of Renaud's unusual ability and I hope that he will now begin to receive that recognition at the hands of the public which has been his due for a long time. Renaud is a dramatic critic with temperament; he is sensitively alive to the dramatic appeal; has never allowed his critical faculty to be cheated with brummagem; and knows how to put on paper the delicate shades of appreciation with which the true critic greets the artistic excellence of theatrical representations. I congratulate the Chronicle on the fact that it is to have genuinely interpretative criticism, I hope the lovers of the drama will learn to turn to the Chronicle for theatrical guidance and I hereby wish more power, not to Renaud's pen, for of course he doesn't use a pen, but to the fingers with which he pounds a responsive typewriter.

George Lask's Return

After a protracted absence George Lask, one of the theatrical men whom San Francisco is proud to sponsor, is back in town as business manager of "The Traveling Salesman," the Forbes comedy playing at the Van Ness. Lask is just as genial as ever and has been holding nightly receptions at the lobby-rail, exchanging amenities with scores of friends who are delighted to see his familiar countenance beaming on local theatredom. When our San Francisco theatrical men go East they are received with a deference which would open the eyes of some of the local pessimists who regard everything on this western rim of the continent as provincial and inferior. Lask relinquished the stage directorship of the Princess Theatre to hie him to the dramatic center of America and was promptly pounced upon by a New York theatrical manager as the best man to chaperone "The Naked Truth" company in its invasion of London. The task appealed to Lask because he rarely lets a year go by without crossing the ocean to look in at the big theatres around Charing Cross and Oxford Circle and assimilate the very latest ideas in dramatic production. He returns to his old habitat with a lot of new notions and a bundle of new yarns which will be filtering through the smoke of the club rooms and the bustle of the hotel lobbies in the course of the next few weeks.

The New Theatre

At this writing New York's repertory theatre is an accomplished fact and is about to receive its first practical test in the production of "Antony and Cleoptara." All who take a genuine interest in the stage will await with interest the verdict which will be pronounced upon the project by experts competent to judge. Certainly the New Theatre starts under most favorable auspices. It has a very promising company, a home of great artistic beauty, a repertoire of varied interest and—most important of all—substantial financial backing. The president of the New Theatre is William K. Vanderbilt; its vice-presidents, Clarence H. Mackay and William B. Osgood Field; treasurer, Otto H. Kahn; secretary, Henry Rogers Winthrop; director, Winthrop Ames; manager, Lee Shubert; literary manager, John Corbin. No suspicion of faddism or crankiness will attach to these executives;

NEW YORK'S REPERTORY THEATRE

The handsome structure on Central Park West at Sixty-second street wherein, backed by brains and money, able players will try to present the best that the drama has to offer.

it is an eminently practical group of money-makers and experienced theatrical men. Another augury of success is the personnel of the box-holders; there are Vanderbilts, Twomblys, Iselins, Whitneys, Morgans, Harrimans, Wideners, Gerards, Guggenheims, Crockers, Hydes, Clews', Fricks, Schiffs, Astors, Stillmans, Belmonts and many others in the list, so that the new playhouse on Central Park is assured of a fashionable clientele. But of course, the success of a theatre is not in the direct ratio of its fashionable patronage; it must appeal strongly to the humble gallery gods or it is doomed to failure; and here again, the New Theatre seems amply fortified. Its appeal, in fact, will be to all classes of theatregoers except to that bad class which loosens its purse-strings most willingly to see vulgarity or libidinosity, a class which may be safely neglected, even in New York.

A Promising List of Players

At the head of the list of forty players stand E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe, two of America's best and sincerest dramatic artists. San Francisco will be interested to know that Eugenie Thais Lawton, a local favorite, and Miss Vida Sutton, a California girl, are in the list. Some of the top-liners will be Charles Cartwright, an Englishman who has played with Mrs. Fiske; Albert Bruning, a German who has played with Booth, Ferdinand Gottschalk, Henry Stanford who has been with Sir Charles Wyndham and Eleanor Robson, Ben Jonson who supported Salvini, Rowland Buckstone, Rose Coghlan, Olive Wyndham, Mrs. Sol Smith Russell, Jessie Busley, and Beverly Sitgreaves. The plays to be presented have conditioned the selection of the company, so that the present aggregation is tentative. It has great possibilities and no doubt, if experience demonstrates that the founders of the New Theatre have builded a permanent institution, there will be no difficulty in obtaining the best talent. Certainly, on the score of comfort, the players will have no complaint to make. There are model dressing-rooms with the latest conveniences, baths, offices and a green room, something which New York has not known since Augustin Daly's death.

An Interesting Repertoire

The opening performance at the New Theatre on Monday night will be "Antony and Cleopatra" with Sothern and Marlowe. Then will follow a light and fantastic comedy by Edward Knobloch called "The Cottage in the Air"; and then Edward Sheldon's serious play of Southern social conditions entitled "The Nigger." "Strife" by John Galsworthy and "The School for Scandal" will also be given. These plays will be produced at intervals during the first six weeks in true repertory fashion. In all probability twelve plays will be presented during the season of twenty or twenty-four weeks and thereafter the company will pay short visits to a few large cities. For one night and one matinee every week during the first year of the New Theatre's foundation opera will be sung; and on Sundays Damrosch and his orchestra will give concerts there. Great emphasis has been laid on the freedom of the New Theatre from any histrionic quackery; the "isms" are to have no place. It is to be a home of fine dramatic entertainment and whatever "elevation" or "uplift" may flow from it will be a natural

Glad News For Music Lovers

Signor Antonio de Grassi and Madam de Grassi—Winifred June Morgan that was—violinists both, more power to their elbows, or wrists, rather; Strongbows though they be, now live this the better side the bay, namely, at 130 Presidio avenue. Some of these fine treaful days, our sleepy sister city will wakeup to her loss and our gain, and vociferously claim Signor de Grassi as "her Antonio" by right of prior residence, even as we, after her departure for appreciative Europe, claimed Miss Parlow as "our Kathleen"—that is to say all of us save only Town Talk which very early in Our Kathleen's career owned her claim to the attention of the world and gave due credit to her master, the world's great dead Henry Holmes. The world's great living Kathleen Parlow and Antonio de Grassi are ours only in proportion as we appreciate their genius rather than the glorifying fact of their residence in our midst. By the way, 'tis to be hoped that the de Grassis will keep up the habit of last-Sunday-in-the-month at homes when their friends and Art's foregather to hear that heavenly music and laughter so uncommonly good for what ails the burdened with this solemn and unmelodious existence. But maybe I malign life. Certain it isn't wholly what I call it. Else I wouldn't be here to tell the sorry tale. Certain, however, it is too lean and inharmonious, and good beyond question it is for such as enjoy the best things thereof to be at de Grassi's of a Sabbath evening, to listen to music as is music and between times grow fat. Ask Fred Maurer if it isn't. He knows a thing or two of these affairs—and is, by the same token, Our Fred, for all that he has deserted us in the flesh for "Berkeley the Beautiful." With the de Grassis in the near future will house a golden throated Bohemian tenor. Look out for your laurels, Mackenzie Gordon!

A Celebrated Scandal

Brief mention was made in the despatches the other day of the death in England of Arthur Wilson, owner of Tranby Croft. This is the Wilson that figured in the famous baccarat scandal of twenty years ago, the sequel of which was the sensational trial of the slander suit brought by Sir William Gordon. The most interesting incident of that celebrated case was the appearance of the Prince of Wales, now King Edward, on the witness stand. After he had given his testimony, and was stepping down from the witness stand he was summoned back to the chair by a small man, who arose in the back of the jury box and said in a sharp, clear voice with a Cockney accent:

"Excuse me, Your Royal Highness. I have a question or two to ask you."

The royal witness was happily equal to the occasion. He wheeled around and stood at attention. The sharp voice spoke again and in dead silence asked the two questions for which everybody was thirsting but which counsel on both sides had strangely omitted. The first question was whether the Prince had seen Sir William cheating, and the second whether he believed Sir William was guilty of cheating. The Prince's answers were as direct as the questions. To the first he said "No." To the second question, in spite of the fact that Sir William's loss of the case entailed his conviction as a cheat, the Prince declared he did believe he cheated. Gordon's fiance, a daughter of Commodore Garner of New York, stood by him devotedly and their marriage took place almost immediately after the trial. Arthur Wilson was the son of Sir Samuel Wilson, for years known as the Croesus of Australia and Member of Parliament for Portsmouth. He married Lady Sarah Isabel Churchill Gordon, sister of the Duke of Marlborough.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy.

Stocks: The recovery in stocks the past week would seem quite logical in view of the character of selling that depressed values the week previous. Commission house liquidation and short selling made a strong technical situation to rally the market on. With fairly liberal shipments of gold out of the country, we find money rates undisturbed, hence we see little or no fear of stringency later on as long as speculation in Wall street is kept in check. The rise in copper stocks in the past week has been the only new feature in the market situation. The rise in these securities can be attributed to two causes, a better outlook for the metal and a demand which is likely to assume important proportions later on; also an undercurrent of feeling in conservative circles that a merger of the leading copper and smelting companies is not improbable. More stability may be looked for in the copper industry in the future. Reports from the important trade circles of the United States indicate that business in all lines continues to improve slowly and railway returns show heavy increases over a year ago at this period on the important trunk line properties; hence we find a strong incentive for the present range of values in leading securities and in some instances opportunity for further substantial improvement on dividend prospects, etc., at a period when less tension exists in the money situation. We hardly believe the time opportune for stock market operations on an extensive scale at the moment, and we doubt if anything more than a comparatively narrow trading market as seen recently will occur in the next two or three weeks.

Grain: Strong buyers have come to the wheat market and there has been a steady accumulation of December by people who believe that shorts will be unable to deliver. The heavy Northwestern receipts have not proven burdensome, as shown in the small increase last Monday in the visible. There is a steady movement of spring wheat by way of Chicago, Detroit and Toledo to millers south of the Lakes, extending to Kentucky and Tennessee. There is no longer a doubt as to depleted supplies of wheat on the farm east of the Misouri River. The winter varieties have held their stiff premiums everywhere. While there is a curtailment of flour shipments from the mills that work on orders, domestic millers report a good trade and no increase of retail stocks. Export flour trade is out of the question at present prices, though large operators in this line made good hedges at a dollar and under in the Chicago and Minneapolis markets and shipments are confined to this class. The Pacific Coast wheat is moving in moderate volume and holding up the export volume. The advance the last three days will bring big receipts next week, and a decline in the market is due, unless the big buyers of December protect the price, though on their theory of ultimate higher prices, they should welcome a decline for further purchases. A scalp only on the downside is in sight at this Corn has held firm on heavy selling by the Patten and related interests. The shorts are basing their play on heavy receipts from Illinois, Indiana and Ohio. So far there has been no rapid selling. The Ohio grain dealers report that corn on the average will not be fit for market before December. Indiana makes similar complaint and Iowa announces that the big yield section had too much moisture and the grain will not be ready for shipment for several weeks. Should a period of damp weather develop south of the Lakes the shorts will come in quickly. The whole corn situation looks strong.

Cotton: Spot cotton continues to dominate a very firm and advancing market, and at the week end traders have come to look upon 15 cents just as they learned to regard 14 cents a little while ago, and 13 cents a few weeks further back. The demand for the actual stuff is of a character that suggests no let-up in the near future, and if there is to be no let-up in the near future, the pigmy size of the remnant will sooner than usual probably balk any attempt to bring about a serious decline in the late season, unless values in the meantime shall have climbed to higher levels. Trade gossip latterly has centered on the buying of March deliveries in America by spot people who do business both in this country and Europe. Straddlers who have sold the Spring deliveries on this side and bought the same deliveries at Liverpool were not at all pleased over this development. Interior buyers are now buying some needed and otherwise unobtainable supplies at New Orleans. Interior prices are relatively high. In all under-supply years, local conditions in New Orleans exert maximum influence on values in the individual primary markets. A few days ago the New Orleans middling spot quotation was raised an eighth to 14 7-16 cents. Simultaneously, Memphis, which, were conditions correct, would be one of the interior markets supplying the port market at New Orleans with cotton, raised her quotation an eighth to 14¾ cents. Under such circumstances, efforts to draw free cotton to New Orleans from that supply center, which ought to enjoy a minimum freight rate because of the navigable river, are about on a par with an attempt to force water to gravitate up hill. At this time the South is literally overrun with men who are endeavoring to buy cotton, and the price they are willing to pay proves that the supply is inadequate to meet the requirement. Mills other than those of New England want this cotton. Very few millmen have as yet signed the Arkwright Club's agreement to curtail production. Most of the others seem to base their refusal upon the fact that the orders they hold are in such volume as to necessitate the operation of their machinery during many months to come. That consumption must be reduced is a fact that admits of no argument. But in the process let us have fair play. High discount rates, high cost of clothes, economies and other normal factors will do the work well, and in keeping with trade's most immutable laws. The integrity of the cotton market is not to be destroyed by the ruling passion of a few zealots or the fixed idea of a few fanatics, nor does the cotton world care a fig what the cross-grained point of view of a single set of men is so long as the spirit of the law designed to serve the general welfare be not broken.

Local Securities: California securities have been rather dull during the past week or so, with the main activity confined to the Hawaiian sugar group. With Cuba centrifugals quoted at 4.30 cents in New York and general conditions improving down at the islands, this section of stocks have lately become very popular and have had some very fair advances. Honokaa, Hutchinson and Paauhau have been the chief traders and have moved steadily toward higher prices. Hawaiian Commercial, Onomea and Makaweli have been less active but their prices have remained firm. Pacific Telephone stocks remain dull with preferred holding very steady, by reason of its regular dividend of $1.50 every quarter, and the common stock has been weaker if anything. Alaska Packers has had some very heavy buying and bids fair to bear out the bullish predictions on it. Spring Valley has displayed an easier tone, though the selling on it has not been of much magnitude. Associated Oil is having a slight reaction but those who are well posted say that it is only a temporary recession. Pacific Lighting common paid its first quarterly dividend of 75 cents per share and in consequence rose to about $52½. Giant Powder has experienced some quiet buying and has risen a point or so. Fireman's Fund is going up by leaps and bounds and it is rumored that the immense earnings of this company will justify an extra dividend at the January meeting. Bond trade has been somewhat reduced with a firm tone in Pacific Telephone 5s as a feature. There have been no important moves either way in the local bond list for some time. Unlisted stocks have been rather neglected, save an excellent demand for California Wine Association stock. Pacific Gas stocks have been temporarily put on the shelf by reason of a reduction of outside buying orders. As the general money market plays an important part in California security dealings and in view of the fact that money is being gradually relieved of the strain that has been on it during the past month or so, our local stocks and bonds should soon feel the effect of a renewal of outside buying and the general list should continue its upward trend. I feel that now is a good time to purchase the leading California issues.

THE FIRST GRAY HAIR

Hath our lady seen a ghost,
That her rosy cheek doth pale?
Oh, what is it that doth ail
Our dear lady, who doth boast
The proud beauty that's our toast?

Yet, good sooth, what ghost could scare
Our sweet lady? She is brave.
'Tis no ghost from out the grave
Hath transfixed our lady fair—
'Tis a beauty's first gray hair.

Ghosts may come in many a guise,
Trooping toward us, too, as fast
From the future as the past;
When that thread doth meet her eyes,
Her own ghost doth seem to rise.

Her own ghost doth rise up, gray,
As she standeth gazing there
At that one prophetic hair,
While her glass doth seem to say,
"Beauty lasteth but a day."

Does Cupid Hide Among the Orchids?

When a young lady receives orchids every day and wears them with an obvious delight not altogether chargeable to the exquisite beauty of these expensive blooms, the wise ones arch their brows and smile and whisper with every appearance of knowing what's what and who's who. That is just what is happening now to Miss Elyse Schultz, the strikingly beautiful brunette who is such a close friend of Miss Enid Gregg. Not only is Miss Schultz wearing orchids but she is seen constantly in the company of a young newspaperman whose uncle is one of our best known newspaper proprietors. This chap's deep devotion to Miss Schultze has been a great deal remarked upon for some time and was particularly conspicuous during our recent Portola entertainments. Another favorite of society who is wearing orchids insists that there is no romantic meaning attached to her affectation of this particular flower. This is Miss Ethel Shorb who crosses her heart and hopes to die if there is any sentimental reason for her receiving them from "an old friend of the family." Miss Shorb's friends have heard all about lovers' oaths and are somewhat sceptical.

PRINCESS DAVID KOWANANAKOA

The Rumor About Two Bachelor Maids

But while we are speculating about the heart-affairs of the younger ladies, let us not by any means overlook the gossip which is being tossed about the tea tables and which has to do with two of the most prominent bachelor maids whose debuts were of great note in days gone by. One of these is a charming cultured woman prominent in the Burlingame set who is said to have been captivated by the mischievous little god after many attempts in which he was continually worsted. The gentleman whose name, it is expected, will be linked with hers in a forthcoming engagement, is an eligible widower. If this gossip is correct there is a surprise in store for society. The parties who form the subject of the other bit of gossip are almost equally interesting. The bachelor girl is the daughter of wealthy parents who are both dead and the man is well known; but I am sworn to secrecy and must not say another word.

Miss Boericke's Romance

Those who have been bidden to attend the elaborate tea over which Mrs. Boericke and her interesting twin daughters, the Misses Ruth and Dorothy, will preside this afternoon confidently expect to hear the announcement of Miss Dorothy's engagement to the only son and heir of a well known bank president and a prominent club woman. While spending the summer in Mill Valley this eligible young chap made Miss Boericke the guest of honor of all his dinners, rides, drives and theatre parties and gave everywhere and at all times evidences of the most devoted attachment. He returned the other day from Santa Barbara where his mother spoke before the Santa Barbara Club.

MISS CORINNE ADAMS

The Century Storm Over Miss Bogue

In its normal condition the Century Club is a temple of cultured enlightenment where no petty feminine bickerings disturb the atmosphere and where the serenity of reposeful scholarship goes hand in hand with placid contemplation of exterior turmoil. But these are parlous days at the Century Club and quietude has fled before the onrush of a tempestuous broil that has divided the membership of the club into two irreconcilable factions. The trouble is all about Miss Vergilia Bogue, the beautiful and queenly mistress of our late revels. During Portola week the Century Club planned a reception and the committee on invitations became tangled in the knotty problem of recognizing or ignoring Queen Vergilia. Some members declared that Miss Bogue certainly ought to be invited; others insisted that she certainly ought not to be included in the list of guests. It was argued on the one hand that Miss Bogue symbolized the Portola carnival and that a Portola reception which would exclude Miss Bogue might just as well not take place. They said Miss Bogue was a very charming, a very cultured and a very representative young Californienne and that any club should consider itself honored in honoring her. The opposing faction retorted that the Century Club was not entertaining symbols; that her charm and her culture and all the rest might be conceded but that she did not occupy the position in the social firmament which would entitle her to twinkle in the frosty exclusiveness of the Century empyrean or words to that general and exceedingly chilling effect. The upshot was that Miss Bogue was not invited, a circumstance which I regret to chronicle, as I feel that it reflects a great deal of discredit on the Century Club. I take my stand unequivocally with the champions of Miss Bogue and I can sympathize with the feeling which has prompted one very cultured member to declare that the club has prepared a true bill of provinicialism against itself and will never regain its self-respect until it pleads guilty and repents in sack-cloth and ashes.

The Bruguiere Toupee

The affairs of Emil Bruguiere have filled columns in the press for a week, but nowhere have I seen mention of the Bruguiere toupee. Yet among the friends of the young millionaire it is a matter of interested comment only second to the news of his alleged devotion to the Princess Braganza. Mr. Bruguiere brought it home from Paris with him. It is a perfect work of art that entirely conceals the familiar bald plate, and only the memory of Mr. Bruguiere's former appearance serves to reveal it as such. It is said that when Mrs. Bruguiere first saw her husband hatless at the dock when she arrived from Tahiti she had difficulty in recognizing him.

Freddie Greenwood "Lost Out"

Fred Greenwood's departure for Portland last Tuesday has revived the rumor of his devotion to a well known belle of the northern city. But let it be explained at once and forthwith that the "well known belle" is now a prominent young matron of Portland society, so there is no immediate danger that Mr. Greenwood will forsake bachelordom. It seems that for once an interesting bit of gossip traveled slowly; so slowly that by the time San Francisco had received news of Mr. Greenwood's deep admiration for the sister-in-law of one of Portland's society leaders who was formerly a belle of this city, this same lovely girl had become the bride of another. True enough, three months ago the young San Francisco millionaire appeared to be a favored suitor, but time works changes and a New York stock-broker "won out." The wedding was a recent event in Portland's smart set. All of which should be most re-assuring to the mystified friends of Mr. Greenwood who were unable to conceive him in the role of Benedick. Mr. Greenwood's present trip is purely a business one. It is not generally known that the millionaire dilletante is in trade. He owns an artistic shop in Portland where one may buy rare antiques and objets d'art gathered during Mr. Greenwood's travels which have extended well over the world. He will go abroad again within a few months to make purchases for his store and doubtless also to secure additions to his private collection of art treasures which is one of the finest in the state.

Angling For Jennie Crocker

A correspondent writes me from London that Mrs. Whitelaw Reid has been in Paris buying frocks for Miss Jennie Crocker who has been her guest for some weeks. Miss Crocker is to be one of the debutantes of the London season, and it is said that already a number of titled beaux are looking forward to opportunities for the cultivation of the rich young woman's acquaintance. She has become the subject of discussion in London drawing-rooms, and match-making dames are urging their bachelor friends to solicit the recommendation of Mrs. Reid who will doubtless in Miss Crocker's behalf keep her eye open for eligible young men. My correspondent also informs me that Mrs. Reid recently received a letter from her niece Lady Granard, telling her that a pair of bronze gates by Benvenuto Cellini could be bought from an impoverished French nobleman on two conditions—that the buyer pay the price set and, to save the nobleman's pride, that his name be kept secret. These gates are modeled in miniature and the nobleman will not allow any would-be purchaser or the curious to inspect the originals. The gates were offered to J. P. Morgan two years ago but he refused to pay the sum asked. So did Lady Hasketh five years ago, although she inherited a fortune from her father, Senator Sharon. The owner refuses to deduct one sou from his figure, but Lady Granard doubtless will buy them, for she has been searching for a pair of massive gates for the main entrance to the banqueting hall of her new and splendid home, Mortimer House. She will buy them because her grandfather, D. Ogden Mills, has told her, in effect:

Princess David of the House of Campbell

Princess David Kowananakoa seems likely to become quite as much of a social celebrity here as she was in Washington, New York and several capitals of Europe where she was always the center of the clever coteries that find diversion in society apart from the wining-dining-dressing monotony that comprises so large a part of the average social program. She is such a brilliant conversationalist in the several languages she speaks that one did not wonder at the vogue she enjoyed during the recent visit of the foreign officers and diplomats. Then too, she is uncommonly good to look upon and is quite a queen in her fashionable evening array. Small wonder she held court so prettily at the several affairs of Portola week. Princess David has taken the handsome Merritt house at Presidio Terrace, one of the most attractive locations in town. Her Honolulu place is one of the celebrated homes of the islands and every visitor of note, literary, ambassadorial, artistic or otherwise, has been entertained there. Princess David was of the Campbell family whose history is blended with that of the islands, and her husband, Prince David, was the heir to the throne at the time of the abdication.

The Changed Social Aspect

With ever so many well-known families leaving for the Orient and Europe this winter, including several of the debutantes of last season and the winter before, and with so many returning who have been away while San Francisco was undergoing the messy process of restoring its destroyed architecture, the social assemblies have quite a different aspect from those of last winter. Then too, the entrance of the score or more of debutantes, with their friends in the foreground, further changes the social aspect. The Ashtons, who have been abroad since the fire, returned during the past week and they will take prominent part in the winter's diversions, Mrs. Ashton being one of the patronesses of the popular Friday night dances at Century Hall. Mr. and Mrs. Hubert Howe Bancroft have taken the Huntington house in Jackson street where they will entertain for Mrs. Charles Olcott Richards and Miss Ruth Richards, thus bringing another family out of seclusion into the prominence they relinquished years ago.

Miss Baker's Wedding

The Baker-MacGavin wedding was the most ceremonious affair of the week, taking place on Wednesday at Trinity Church which was converted into a flower chapel for the occasion. Few churches adapt themselves so easily to a decorative scheme as Trinity, and this is probably one reason for its popularity with brides. The color scheme was yellow, chrysanthemums predominating. All of the trousseau came from Paris, having been purchased by Helen Baker's sister Dorothy and her aunt, Miss Kate Stone who returned last week from the other side. The wedding attracted much more attention than any other this fall, for the fashion show was well worth seeing. There were ten girls attending the bride, with Miss Dorothy Baker, looking like a little blonde Parisian beauty, leading as maid of honor. The frocks of the girls were all in pale maise color, cowwebby chiffons and laces being used, making them look like dainty flower blossoms. The bride wore the time-honored white satin, quite covered with rosepoint which had been used on her mother's wedding gown. Some of the prettiest girls among the younger set were in the processional; dainty Miss Ruth Richards, Miss Bessie Ashton, Miss Alexandra Hamilton, Miss Sara Coffin, Miss Louisiana Foster, Miss Louise Boyd, Miss Dolly MacGavin and Miss Claire Nichols. No end of entertaining has been done in honor of the bride; in fact, her relatives are quite worn out with the constant feting, and Mrs. Wakefield Baker, who has done so much for her niece, plans to leave this week for the east to recuperate from the strain of the season's diversions.

Miss Sonntag's Debut

Miss Ila Sonntag's debut last Saturday had the charm of old-fashioned flavor, many of the guests being of the aristocratic regime that has suffered some eclipse since Burlingame wealth began glimmering on the social horizon. While Miss Sonntag is not a beauty, she has a loveable disposition and seems precisely the sort of girl to make many genuine friendships. Beauties, as a rule, seldom wear well. Miss Ila is of the demure, modest-violet type, very gracious and girlishly pretty, the type that has genuine quality and enjoys enduring popularity. She comes of the ancient regime that used to reign with autocratic exclusiveness over society in days gone by. The debut was made in the old home in Octavia street where her grandmother, who was a Dent, entertained President Grant and Mrs. Grant who was also a Dent during their visit in San Francisco. The Dents were the aristocrats in old St. Louis when Grant was a struggling youth and his marriage into the family was regarded by the Dents as a great mesalliance. Miss Sonntag is therefore remotely related to Miss Nellie Grant. Mrs. Sonntag was a Reis.

In the Social Spotlight

The many friends of Mrs. Lawrence W. Harris will be sorry to hear that she has been quite ill at the Long Sanitarium for the past two weeks. She is now rapidly recovering and will return to her home in Washington street this week.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Malcolm Eaton have returned from their wedding tour and are now settled in their home, 2839 Broderick street.

Mr. and Mrs. Peter F. Dunne will soon leave for the East. Much entertaining is being done in their honor.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Wilson were hosts at an elaborate dinner at their home in Third avenue on Saturday last.

Mrs. William Parker Treat is slowly recovering from a very severe illness.

The wedding of Miss Arline Johnson and George Towne of Palo Alto is set for December. It will be a brilliant social event in Oakland at the home of the William Pierce Johnsons.

Miss Ernistine McNear's card party at her home in Oakland this week was in the nature of a farewell to her many young friends prior to her departure for the East.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Warren have taken a house in Hyde street for the winter.

A charming young girl from the South, Miss Belle Riggin, the attractive niece of Colonel Stevens, U. S. A., will spend the winter in San Francisco.

Mrs. William Mintzer has issued cards for at home days for Wednesdays in November at her handsome home in Pacific avenue.

Major and Mrs. Andrew Rowan, U. S. A., have taken possession of their attractive new home on Russian Hill. Major Rowan has just retired from the army.

An interesting Progressive Vaudeville entertainment took place in Fruitvale on last Saturday evening. The ladies who had the aair in charge were Mrs. Daniel Crosby, Mrs. Walter Brann and Miss Marwedel.

Mrs. Harold Havens of Piedmont gave one of the most elaborate receptions of the early season at her beautiful home on Tuesday in honor of her mother, Mrs. John V. Cheney, who is the founder of the Woman's International League.

The Albert Sidney Johnston Chapter, United Daughters of Confederacy, are arranging for their annual tea which will take place at the St. Francis Hotel on December 4.

Mrs. John Boggs and her daughter Miss Alice have taken apartments at Coyne Court, Berkeley, for the winter. The wedding of Miss Boggs and Charles Dutton will take place late in December.

Charles Dutton has issued a hundred or more cards for a recital to be given at his new studio in Berkeley next Tuesday evening. Ashley Pettis, his talented pupil, will be presented.

The Claremont Country Club was the scene of an elaborate dinner last Saturday evening when Mrs. Edward Lacey Brayton made Miss Ernistine McNear the guest of honor. The dinner was followed by an informal dance.

A wedding of interest to Californians will take place in Washington, D. C., on Saturday, December 11, when Miss Jean Pedler will become the bride of Carlton Baker.

P. E. Bowles and family have taken apartments at the Fairmont Hotel for the winter.

Mrs. William Niles and Mrs. W. G. Hughes of Los Angeles are guests at the Fairmont.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at Hotel del Coronado were E. Myron Wolf, A. J. Brander, H. L. Sale, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Maguire and Dick Corbinn.

The wedding of Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick and Alan Macdonald will take place in April, about Easter time.

Miss Laura McKinstry made Gertrude Atherton the guest of honor at a large luncheon on Monday at the Francisca Club.

Mrs. J. D. Peters and her daughter Miss Anna who have been at the Fairmont Hotel for the last two months have returned to their home in Stockton preparatory to an extended visit to the East during the winter.

Among the recent arrivals at the Fairmont were W. S. Cassells, Robt. T. Massie, Toronto; W. K. Betty, Johannesburg; Dr. and Mrs. Theo. Wermer, Chemnitz, Germany; Henry P. Judd, Honolulu; Miss Hunt and Miss Mortimore of London.

Late additions to the "Service Set" at the Fairmont include Dr. and Mrs. C. C. Green, U. S. N., E. W. McIntyre, U. S. N., Mr. and Mrs. T. F. Thornburg, Washington, D. C.

A recent engagement is that of Miss Isabel Morris, daughter of Mrs. W. F. Morris, to W. Hobart Garlick of Cincinnati. The secret was told recently to a company of girl friends who were bidden by Mrs. W. F. Morris to luncheon at the Hotel Victoria. An informal tea following the luncheon was made the occasion for congratulations to the attractive bride-elect, who is a graduate of Miss Head's school in Berkeley.

Miss Alma Thane was a recent hostess at cards, a dozen guests sharing her hospitality at the Hotel Victoria. The hour at cards was followed by an informal tea.

Among the arrivals at the Hotel Victoria are Mr. and Mrs. J. Jerome Smith of Stockton, Mrs. Harrill and daughter, Miss Bernice Harrill of Bakersfield, Miss Isabel McPherson of Portland, Mrs. M. E. Heron and Miss Heron of Vallejo.

Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Leffingwell, Mrs. E. N. Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Carey, Mr. Homer Wood and Mrs. E. B. Rowley are established for the winter in apartments at the Victoria.

Lieut. and Mrs. Edward L. Lane are settled at the Victoria for the winter.

Among the recent guests at The Tavern of Tamalpais were Miss F. M. Hagerty, Johannes Reimers, Adeline Lemen, Alida Reimers, R. H. Schindler, Richard Brown, Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Brandenstein, C. L. Harrison, Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Stone, Mrs. B. F. Wise, Daniel E. Hayes, Mrs. M. P. Gleason, G. H. Cunningham, Mrs. J. Stadefeld and Clare L. Campbell.

Mr. and Mrs. Vere Ellinwood who have been at the St. Francis since their marriage, have moved into their new home in Pierce street, near Pacific avenue.

Templeton Crocker entertained at luncheon Thursday in the St. Francis; his guests being Mrs. Walter Martin, Mrs. Thomas Eastland, Miss Gertrude Jolliffe, Miss Virginia Jolliffe, Duane Hopkins and Walter Hobart.

Walter Gifford Smith gave a delightful little dinner at the St. Francis a few nights ago in honor of Princess David Kowananakoa of Honolulu. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Smith, Mrs. Marie L. Walton and Charles Pendleton.

Origin of the "Thirteen" Superstition

By J. R. Abarbanell

Every one knows the superstitious dread that attaches to the presence of thirteen around the table at a meal; but few know the supposed origin of the superstition. Of all these minor superstitions, perhaps the most prevalent is that of sitting thirteen at table. An idea of its prevalance among all nations may be obtained by adverting to the well-known facts that the Turks have almost expunged the number (13) from their vocabulary; that the Italians never use it in making up the numbers for their lotteries, and that the thirteenth card in one of their games bears the figure of death; that no house in Paris bears the No. 13, and that in that city the Quartorzienes are recognized persons in society who hold themselves in readiness to be invited to any dinner which otherwise would have the fatal thirteen at the festal board. The thirteen superstition, briefly stated, is that if thirteen persons, either by accident or design, dine together at the same table one will die within a year. Its origin has been traced back to the old Norse mythology, in which occurs the story of the gods sitting down to a feast with Loke in the Valhalla. Baldur was the thirteenth at the table, and had to die. It is hardly likely, though, that so obscure a tradition connected with an ancient faith limited to a comparatively small locale would be able to spread its pernicious influence so broadcast over the earth. The popularly-accepted origin may be taken as the right one. The Last Supper, which so immediately preceded the crucifixion of the Saviour, must always have excited a sentiment of awe in the breasts of the faithful, which in an unenlightened age easily degenerated into a feeling of superstitious terror. Leonardo da Vinci, in his famous painting on the wall in the refectory of the Dominican convent of Santa-Maria-della-Gracie in Milan, unwittingly, perhaps, gave the first impulse to the superstition in the minds of the ignorant masses who beheld the twelve Apostles and the Master at table. To see before their eyes the fatal feast itself must have affected them far more profoundly than could the most eloquent sermon on the subject. In this picture, too, we see Judas in the act of spilling the salt; thus it is fair to presume that both superstitions have practically the same origin.

Maxims and Reflections

Error is continually repeating itself in action, and we must unweariedly repeat the truth in word.

It is only when a man knows a little, that he knows anything at all. With knowledge grows doubt.

An intelligent man finds almost everything ridiculous, a wise man hardly anything.

The true is Godlike: we do not see it itself; we must guess at it through its manifestations.

One need only grow old to become gentler in one's judgments. I see no fault committeed which I could not have committed myself.

It is said that no man is a hero to his valet. That is only because a hero can be recognized only by a hero. The valet will probably know how to appreciate his like —his fellow-valet.

Yorick in Valencia Street

By Edward F. O'Day

From my program I learn that Edgar Smith wrote the book for "Mr. Hamlet of Broadway." That being the case, I have a bone to pick with Edgar Smith. Ingenious gentleman that he is, he has undoubtedly constructed a framework that encloses a generous portion of Eddie Foy's comicality; but I am constrained to charge him with a wilful sin of omission. The fact is that in building "Mr. Hamlet of Broadway" he has been exceedingly careful to include plenty of Broadway, but he came very near leaving Mr. Hamlet out. If Edgar Smith (and Eddie Foy) will pardon an unnecessary allusion to Shakespeare, "Mr. Hamlet of Broadway" reminds me of Falstaff's score; there is one half-pennyworth of Hamlet to an intolerable deal of Broadway. It may be, of course, that Edgar Smith is a cunning and calculating caterer to the demands of Broadway; he may have given that lurid thoroughfare—if it be a thoroughfare and not a lurid state of mind—just so much and no more of Hamlet as he knew it would stand. If Broadway likes its theatrical entertainment in proportion as it is scantily draped, I have no doubt that it received infinitely more satisfaction from the chorus than from Mr. Hamlet, for at times the chorus was very scantily draped indeed and there were no draperies at all on the bathing girls; they looked as though their suits were altogether too small for them in the first place and had shrunk woefully in the water. But to return to Mr. Hamlet. Edgar Smith was as niggardly in supplying him with line as the costumer was in draping the charms of the chorus girls. Of course "Mr. Hamlet of Broadway" contains plenty of Eddie Foy, but it contains very little of Eddie Foy as Mr. Hamlet. And that was a keen disappointment to me. If Eddie Foy could be induced to unbosom himself, I think he would confess that in his heart of hearts he believes that in the part of Hamlet, as constructed by Mr. Shakespeare and not by Edgar Smith, he could very nearly out-Edwin Booth. That is a secret and sacred tenet of every comedian's creed. Even Louis James, a born comedian, cherished that dear delusion. I do not wish to be suspected of mental cruelty or of a morbid attitude toward the stage, but I admit that the spectacle of Eddie Foy burlesquing the part which I am sure he would dearly love to play, afforded me a sort of sardonic delight. It was almost as good fun as it would have been if Eddie Foy had been allowed to essay the role seriously. That would be a mirth-provoking spectacle which the gods would crowd out of the heavens to witness; but the substitute was a masterpiece of merriment. Only it was too short. There was a chuckle born every minute, but there were so few minutes. I had not half finished laughing at that first inimitable line: "A little less in front and more behind," before the burlesque was over. Why was Edgar Smith so stingy? We of the provinces are not afraid of Shakespeare, even when he is burlesqued; we could have stood five times as much as Edgar vouchsafed us. Think of the fat possibilities Edgar Smith overlooked. Where was the ghost? May not the ghost walk in musical comedy? And where were the players? I can conceive no funnier situation than to have the roadsters of a musical comedy impersonate a company of bad actors; it would be one of the most realistic things on the stage—and one of the easiest. But if Edgar Smith was afraid to invade the province of the box office by making the ghost walk and feared to wound the sensitive susceptibilities of the principals by having them appear as bad actors with Eddie Foy to instruct them in their art, he might at least have shown us Polonius and Laertes. Polonius delivering a code of ethics and etiquette framed from, let us say, "The Danger Mark" would have been delicious and Laertes might have wrangled with Hamlet in language culled from Commander Peary's telegrams. But alas, Edgar Smith wrote "Mr. Hamlet of Broadway" for Broadway and he deliberately clipped the pinions of his imagination. I know he has imagination for he introduces a chorus of Hamlets and Ophelias singing and dancing rag-time with a company of khaki-clad soldier boys. The chorus girls looked hot and unhappy in all those clothes but the number was a decided novelty. Hamlet would surely have thought that there was something rotten in Denmark if he had seen all those Hamlets and Ophelias doing syncopated time; perhaps he would have rubbed his eyes and concluded that he was "full of bread" or something. Or he might have joined in the dance; I think he once called himself a jig-maker. I am sure he would have enjoyed the bathing girls; some of them would have reminded him of that bare bodkin. I do not doubt Hamlet would have relished Eddie Foy. "You jig, you amble and you lisp," he might have said to him with perfect truth. There would have been little melancholy at Elsinore if Eddie Foy had happened to stray that way; with his gibes and gambols, his songs and his flashes of merriment he would have been a worthy successor to good old Yorick.

Alcazar Has New Leading Man

John Ince, the Alcazar's new leading man, will make his first appearance in San Francisco Monday evening as Teddy North in "The Cowboy and the Lady," which was written by the late Clyde Fitch and starred in by Nat Goodwin and Maxine Elliott. While the play contains situations that approach the melodramatic, it never departs from legitimacy. Its comedy incidents are of a high order and its heart interest is appealing. North is a Harvard graduate who has taken up residence in the west, where he is attracted to Mrs. Weston, the wife of a characterless adventurer, and assumes the guardianship of Midge, a mountain waif who is in love with Joe, a cowboy. In the course of his recklessness Weston insults Midge in the presence of North who threatens to kill him if the offense is repeated, and also arouses the anger of Jim, a half-breed, by his attentions to Mollie Larkins, a dance-hall keeper, with whom the Indian is infatuated.

MME. JOMELLI

The great prima donna who will sing at the Novelty Theatre besides appearing before the St. Francis Musical Art Society.

From then on the play gathers intensity but comes to a happy ending. Evelyn Vaughan will play Mrs. Weston, Bessie Barriscale will be cast as Midge, and all the other Alcazar favorites will have well-fitting roles. As the plays calls for realistic staging, some effective pictures may be expected.

The Jomelli Concerts

A new prima donna from the great opera houses of Europe and America will be introduced during the coming week by Impresario Greenbaum in the person of Mme. Jeanne Jomelli. Miss Marie Nichols, a violin virtuosa of the highest order, will be with her. Three concerts will be given at the Novelty Theatre, the dates being Friday night, November 12, Sunday afternoon, November 14 and Tuesday night, November 16. Mme. Jomelli will introduce some of the arias from her great successes, Massenet's "Thais," Charpentier's "Louise" and Pucini's "La Tosca" besides songs by Wolf, Strauss, Schubert and Brahms. Among the works for violin to be played by Miss Nichols is an old French sonata by Francoeur which her master DeBrut of the Paris Conservatoire copied from a manuscript in a convent in Southern France and a rarely heard "Chant Russe" by Lalo.

"The Three Twins" at the Garrick

Gottlob, Marx and Co. will assume the direction of the Garrick beginning tomorrow night when they will present the first offering of what promises to be a very interesting season. "The Three Twins" starts a two weeks' engagement with the night performance Sunday. It enjoyed a run of five months at the Whitney Theatre in Chicago and went for a solid year at the Herald Square in New York. It is described as a musical comedy with a plot and many novel features. The show is lavishly costumed and has a fine lot of show girls. The company is headed by Victor Morley who created the leading role.

The Genial Drummer at the Van Ness

If Mark Smith who plays the title role in "The Traveling Salesman" at the Van Ness cared to forsake the stage for the busy marts of trade, it is a safe wager that many of our big commercial houses would bid for his services. Smith has the commercial traveler's temperament raised to the top degree; he exudes geniality and plausibility and it would be a hopeless customer who could resist the fascination of his good-nature. Decidedly the audience at the Van Ness likes Smith's "line"; in lieu of orders they give him applause and follow his course through the bright clean play with a tribute of chortles and giggles which he quite obviously enjoys. "The Traveling Salesman" will pack his trunks and depart after Sunday, November 14. Victor Moore in George M. Cohan's successful music play, "The Talk of New York," will open an engagement of two weeks at the Van Ness on Monday, November 15. Moore comes here with all the people who supported him during the long New York and Chicago runs of the comedy and the scenic embellishments will be a feature of the attraction. The character of "Kid Burns" will be played by Moore.

Miss Inez Dibblee's Debut as a Dancer

Miss Inez de la Guerra Dibblee of the great old Spanish house of de la Guerra whose name is closely identified with the history of California, is to make her debut as a professional dancer. Miss Dibblee lived for some time in Paris studying music, art and dramatic expression and has derived some original ideas from observation of the classical dances of Miss Isidora Duncan, Loie Fuller and others. People who have seen her work in private and at a fashionable charity function in San Rafael say that she has a style and quality entirely her own and Herman Perlet, the well known conductor and composer, speaks very highly of her. Her debut will be made at the first event of the St. Francis Musical Art Society where she will occupy a place on the program with Mme. Jomelli. She will do some Oriental and Spanish dances to music by Rubinstein, Saint-Saens and Grieg. Her laces and scarfs are those in which some of her ancestors appeared at the court of Spain.

Military Stunt at the Orpheum

The Orpheum program for next week will have as its chief attraction "Our Boys in Blue," a military spectacle. Lulu McConnell and Grant Simpson will give a bright little comedy called "A Stormy Hour" by Lester Lonergan. It was specially written for Miss McConnell. The Tempest and Sunshine Trio, consisting of Florence Tempest, Little Sunshine and Junie Ijames will be quite an attraction. This trio of fascinating young beauties was a feature of Ziegfeld's first revue, "The Follies of 1907" and last year they were with the original production of "Little Nemo" at the New Amsterdam Theatre, New York. The Russian-Roumanian gladiators, Bobby Pandor and Brother, appropriately styled "The Modern Hercules," will present a series of athletic poses on a specially constructed cabinet. Next week will conclude the engagements here of Minnie Seligman and William Bramwell in their little drama, "The Drums of Doom," the Bounding Gordons and the Bootblack Quartette. It will also be the last of the marvelous chimpanzee, Charles the First, who does everything but talk and who has created a real sensation in vaudeville. A new series of motion pictures will finish the performance.

The Final Sousa Concerts

Sousa and his band will be heard for the last time this season at Dreamland Rink this afternoon and night and tomorrow afternoon and night. The program for the Saturday night concert will include Sousa's descriptive suite, "The Last Days of Pompeii," a new tone poem called "Finlandia" by Sibelius and Liszt's "Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody." For the farewell concert on Sunday night "Les Preludes," Edward German's "Welsh Rhapsody" and other interesting works are promised and by special request Sousa will give his comic fantasy, "The Band Came Back" and repeat his new suite "People Who Live in Glass Houses." On Monday afternoon and night Sousa will occupy the Greek Theatre at Berkeley. In case of inclement weather the concerts will be given in the Harmon Gymnasium. Two special programs have been prepared for these events including several works not played at the other concerts.

Another Week of Foy

The last week of Eddie Foy and the Shubert company in "Mr. Hamlet of Broadway" will commence at the Valencia Theatre tomorrow night, with the only matinee Saturday and from present indications standing room will be at a premium during the rest of the engagement. "Billy," a highly original farce that kept immense audiences at Daly's Theatre, New York, laughing for six months, will follow "Mr. Hamlet of Broadway," coming direct from the metropolis.

Sequel to Clansman at Ye Liberty

Commencing Monday evening the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will offer the initial production given in the West of "The Traitor," the play made from Thomas Dixon's story of the South. Coming as it does after the storm of criticism and discussion caused by "The Clansman," a previous dramatic work by the same author to which it is a sequel, "The Traitor" will unquestionably excite keen interest among trans-bay theatregoers. The play concerns the fortunes of rival Klans rather than the issue between the whites and the blacks, and in justice to those who found much that was objectionable in the stage presentation of "The Clansman" it should be said that nothing of the kind exists in "The Traitor." Sydney Ayres was the original Ben Cameron in the New York production of "The Clansman," so he should be good in "The Traitor," and with Florence Oakley in the leading feminine role and the remainder of the favorites in the cast, it should be a strong one. After "The Traitor" a revival of "The Rose of the Rancho" will be given in which Florence Oakley will make her farewell appearance with the Bishop players.

Conservatory Has New Virtuosa

The California Conservatory of Music announces the engagement of the violin virtuosa, Madame Eileen O'Moore, for its violin department. Madame O'Moore studied in Leipzig with Hans Sitt and was awarded the Mendelssohn scholarship of the Conservatorium. From there she went to Brussels and became a pupil of the celebrated Ysaye, finally finishing her studies with Sevcik in Prague. Madame O'Moore will be presented at the third concert of the Conservatory which will take place on Friday, November 12, at the hall of the conservatory, 147 Presidio avenue. The program will be: Schumann, Faschingsschwank in Wien op. 26 for piano: Hermann Genss; Songs for Tenor: Bendel, Wie beruhrt mich wundersam; Gade, Lebe wohl, teures Gretchen; Becker, Fruhlingszeit: Charles Bulotti; Concert for Violin by Paganini-Wilhelmj: Madame O'Moore; Canon for two Sopranos and Alto by Rossini: Misses Hazel and Myrtle Wood and Miss Grace Brown; Spohr, Adagio from Concerto No. 9, and Sarasate, Zigeunerweisen for Violin: Madame O'Moore.

A Rothschild a Playwright

After having served a dramatic apprenticeship by writing several curtain-raisers under an assumed name Baron Henri de Rothschild, of the famous family of bankers, has come out openly as a playwright in Paris. His latest production is a three-act drama entitled "La Pampe" ("The Footlights.") It deals with the irresistible attraction of the stage. In one daring line he speaks of the fascination the stage has for millionaires, thus disclosing beyond mistake his own impulses. The play is intensely dramatic in some situations. It tells the story of a society woman allured by the stage. She deserts her husband to take up with a famous actor. Her talent is pronounced, although she cannot adapt herself to the private life of theatrical folk. Love of the art, however, carries her to the front in public esteem. Her success with the Parisian public provokes the jealousy of her actor lover, who tries to drive her from his company. She prevails on him to see the rehearsal of a new play in which she is to appear. This play has a poison scene and as she acts it she takes real poison and dies with her lover looking on. The critics all commend it, agreeing that it shows strong constructive power. Public opinion confirms the professional estimate of the work, which promises to hold the boards for a long time. Apart from his skill as a writer Baron Henri de Rothschild has achieved fame as a doctor and scientist.

Two of Klaw and Erlanger's most notable attractions, "The Round Up" and McIntyre and Heath in their newest musical diversion, "In Hayti," are to be seen here during the season.

Although the opening of the new Columbia Theatre is yet two months off there have been over fifteen hundred inquiries regarding that event and the office of Gottlob, Marx and Company is daily besieged by those who seek to make some arrangement regarding seat reservations. Absolutely nothing has been done in this regard and full announcements will be made in due time.

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

Written exclusively for Town Talk by J. M. JACOBI

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

Are we, in our ready-for-service garments, coming to the fashion that prevails in English clothes? Are not some of the most advanced of American stylers already reaching after the soft, unpadded smaller garments of our English cousins, the smartly attired fashionables of London who do know how to dress? This fall one of the largest metropolitan manufacturing retail clothiers introduces its new garments without shoulder pads and only just enough artificial extension in the sleeve-head to insure smoothness. And this little cotton is still included, perhaps, because here the clientele has not yet begun to appreciate or fancy the softer lines and graceful natural shoulder of the English garment. Or does the bit of cotton serve to obtain an effect not possible without it, only through very good and careful tailoring? The coats are shorter and smaller, being less full than the general cut of the sack of present vogue.

In our forthcoming spring styles we will have the better fitting, shapely sack coat, having a low curving waist and a fall over the hips that will be rather more snug and hip-forming than anything so nearly like the English lounge we have had since we took up here the extreme flare and the obtrusive side-creasings of present vogue. But in the exaggerated fullness of the chest that has now approached an extreme extension of the forepart, making the difficulties of a good fit more and more troublesome, we are adding more of that hercules bulk to the masculine figure that came in with abnormal shoulder pads, and to these we also add big elbow sleeves. Little wonder then that there is an outcry against big shoulders and sleeves and bulging chests and loose clothes that are increasing the hazards of both manufacturing and fitting our garments. And with the protests against these extreme proportions there is coming to be felt a need for garments with less padding, more natural shoulders and foreparts that are less chesty; garments, on the whole, that are smaller and fit better than the long, loose exaggerations now in vogue.

Immediately following the bringing out of freak clothes there came a sensible demand for conservative styles as essential to a safer business. And at once we go into the extremes of big chests and big ungraceful sleeves. While their creators defend their works by proclaiming that the young men want these things and will have nothing else, there are those sitting in judgment who give decision in effect that these clothes should fit properly and becomingly.

An Expert's Criticism

An expert on fashions and the making of clothes pays high tribute to the wonderful advance of the ready-for-service clothing when he states that such well-made clothes as our industry is today turning out are a threat to the custom tailors. And he touches weak points that are still retained in our styling when he says that, excepting for the exaggerated dip of the coats, still one of the worst features of our styling, our coats are well cut. The shoulders, he says, no longer protrude at each side as if the man inside were a Sharkey or a Jeffries, and there is a decrease in the number of queer cuffs, vertical pockets and vents, which have been so pronounced as style features in our clothes. He adds that the thing that seems most difficult for our manufactures to get away from is the heavy look over the shoulders, a thing that is noticeable in the best dress coats, which ought to be light, if any garment should; for there's no reason why a dress coat or dinner jacket should have the look of a football jacket over the shoulders. The reason he gives why it is so hard to do away with pads is that our industry finds it is easier to make clothes fit by the use of much padding. He charges the custom tailors, many of them, with resorting to the same means for making clothes fit. Some of our clothes, he claims, look as if they were made for knockabout comedians on a vaudeville stage; and the big shoulders and chests in some of our overcoats make the wearer look as if he had on a straight-front corset. Because of the many exaggerations, this expert, while very impartially giving credit to ready-for-service clothing where credit is due, characterizes many of our fall styles as being freakish and crazy.

Where such appellations would fit they applied only because the garments thus criticized showed the style exaggerations that have never done anything for the ready-for-service clothing industry except to increase the risks of selling.

If we are ever to come to the soft, graceful fitting clothes of the best dressed of our English cousins, it will be necessary to eliminate the padding, reduce the size of the arm scye, make smaller sleeves, natural shoulders and chest. And that we are slowly drifting thitherward is apparent in the significance already attached to smaller shoulders without pads, shapelier and smaller garments, and a reduction of the peg-top proportions of trousers by the most advanced thinkers in the trade.

After all is said and done the refined dresser finds pleasure in clothes without exaggeration, and the greatest compliment is paid to the merchant tailors who are top-notchers when the ready-for-service man is trying to imitate them.

had swung against a plodding camel's side in some caravan that crossed the Syrian desert sands; it had lain concealed in the hold of some Levantine galley whose sails bellied toward the West.

In its sombre blue there still lingered a glow like that which filters through the multicolored trellises of a harem—shades saturated with mysterious light and shadows. What white fingers, their tips ablush with henna, had last laid their dull, uncomprehending touch upon this cup? And the scent that still lingered about the rim, was it sherbet of roses cooled in the snow, or some gentle breath whose fragrance is perceptible only in dreams?

Hesitatingly, as if she wished to test the reality of the azure marvel, the young woman touched the glass. "Oh!" she murmured, "how can such beauty be possible?"

Her husband had scanned the beaker with the calm pleasure, the instinctive appreciation of beauty that makes the fine in art as much a life-necessity to the heir of immemorial wealth and luxury as good wine, horses of the finest breed or courtly manners.

"It is a masterpiece," he declared with conviction. "Even the antique glasses in the Musee Cluny are not more beautiful. Who is the maker?"

The manager named him. "Alvise Berovieri. He is our best artist in Venice. We have even called him the Benvenuto Cellini of glass." And, as if lost in thought, he moved a finger caressingly along the beaker's rim. Then he went on: "He is getting old; alas, old! But his eyes are still strong, and the entire day he sits bent over his work, yonder in his lofty atelier in the Palazzo Faler."

With evident pleasure the distinguished connoisseur repeated the name: "Alvise Berovieri." In his thoughts the splendor of the creation and its creator formed a harmonious accord. He saw it as a scene out of the Italy of the Renaissance; the old artist, seated in a hall of the princely palace, handling the gold and glass and splendid enamel in the light that fell through slender, arched windows on his bent head and beauty-creating hands. And when his beautiful companion cried impulsively: "Oh, I wish we could visit him in his atelier!" he merely smiled and answered: "I see no objection to that." And they went.

The gondolier found the distant canal and the dark old palace from whose eaves eagles threatened to swoop down, fierce with outstretching heads and extended wings. A coat of arm surmounted the arched windows of the sculptured balcony above the entrance. The marble steps rising out of the water to the deep, dark gateway were green with slime from the rising and falling tide. In the shadow of the colonnade which surrounded the sunny inner court a young woman was seated, making lace. She looked up at the call of the gondolier for Berovieri. He was in his workshop, she said; upstairs there. She would show his excellency the way.

The two followed up a stately marble staircase which ascended past faded frescoes hanging loosely from the walls, past empty niches and columned portals with their mosaic floors still bright. Then followed a second flight of steeper, narrower steps of gray stone which seemed unending, boring upward with repeated turns. Then, still steeper and narrower, a third flight, till at length they reached the hot, dizzy steps of a garret and a door shorn of paint, shrunken and cracked by the scorching heat, through which filtered the rays of the sun. A pungent odor of turpentine assailed their nostrils. Without knocking the padrona pushed the door open and, pointing with her hand, merely said, "There he is," and was gone.

In a glare of sunlight on white-washed walls they saw a low, bare, little room with a square window through which the blue sky was visible. On shelves along the wall was a glitter of glassware. Before the window sat a small, lean old man in purplish shirt-sleeves, with a leather apron hanging sideways about him, his shining bald skull bent over his work. A child with black, curly locks lay stretched at full length on the floor, making stars and other fanciful figures with many-colored bits of glass. On perceiving the strangers she scrambled up and snuggled close against the old man, murmuring in her lisping Venetian dialect. The workman turned his head and, seeing the visitors halting on the threshold, slowly arose with the stiff, painful movement of one who has been sitting for hours in a cramped position.

His figure was small and thin, withered and bent like a piece of dried timber, with a sallow face covered with a network of furrows and wrinkles, and weary eyes, black as night, between his red eyelids. His faded shirt hung awkwardly about the sharp, long shoulders and sunken chest. In his hand was a shining implement.

"One of his assistants, doubtless—a polisher or something of that sort," said the visitor in his own tongue. Then, in Italian, he explained his appartnet mistake to the workman.

"We would like to see the signor himself—Signor Berovieri."

The little man blinked his weary eyes, multiplying the network of wrinkles.

"I am Berovieri," he said.

"Signor Berovieri," the stranger repeated with emphasis, "the artist in glass."

The other nodded. "Yes, the glassworker. I am he."

The stranger merely shrugged his shoulders impatiently. "There must be some misunderstanding," he insisted. "We are looking for the maestro, for him who made the blue beaker at Graffi's."

"Yes, that's myself."

In amazed silence the two looked at this humble workman, with his redlidded eyes, his bent back and crooked fingers. And both at once became conscious of the wretched surroundings, the bare walls, the crippled furniture, the squalid pallet rolled in a corner, the worn-out coat hanging on a nail in the wall; and on a table, among a jumbled litter of implements and pieces of glass, the remnants of the midday meal—a bit of polenta, a pile of fish-bones, and the rind of a melon sucked down to the very skin.

In a dull, monotonous voice that betrayed years of solitude, the old man asked: "In what can I be of service to his excellency?"

The nobleman made no answer. He felt a sudden, violent disgust rising within him at the ridiculousness of the thing, at the silly position in which he thought himself placed. With almost angry contempt he surveyed the old drudge from head to foot, the fellow whom he had taken for a genius. The young woman noticed it and blushed, while sympathetic tears sprang to her eyes, and she whispered:

"We had better go back."

But he answered with an impatient gesture. That didn't suit him, now. Then he turned to the workman and said gruffly:

"We'd like to see some of your work."

"I've nothing finished," was the answer. The poor fellow seemed surprised at the demand.

On the work-bench stood a wide dish glistening in dull gold. "What's the price of this?" the stranger asked.

The glassworker shrugged his shoulders. "I do not know. The price of an article is fixed when it is finished."

The evasive answer, which sounded like an awkward attempt to gain time while calculating on a higher figure, aroused the anger of the Maecenas.

"I have no time to wait for your calculations," he said sharply. "How much do you want for this dish? Without shuffling now."

The other looked at him, failing to catch his meaning.

"Well, what will you take for it?"

"I'm not allowed to sell it," answered the glassworker. "Everything I make is the property of the firm." And he pointed to the firm name cast into the base of the gilt dish.

"To be sure, the factory mark. Where will your own signature appear?"

"I am not allowed to put my own name to it. Everything passes under the name of Graffi."

"What? Your own work? But every artist does that!"

"Only the rich," the old man replied, quite simply, "those who work on their own account. I have always been merely a journeyman."

He held up to the light the dish they had been handling, and carefully wiped it. The golden reflection fell upon his features. He looked at it silently, lost in thought, as if he were alone. Half audibly the gentleman said to his companion: "You see, he is merely a common workman—handy at his trade, naturally, and with some sense of the beautiful, like all Italians."

"Y-e-s," the young woman replied abstractedly. She scarcely dared look at the poverty-stricken old man whose work sparkled in the palaces of kings. A sensation came over her as if she ought to beg his pardon for a fault she did not know, but which yet fretted her gentle soul—for her own youth and wealth and happiness, perhaps. And she felt as if she ought to tell him that she had not intruded into his workshop merely with the idle curiosity of the great; that she recognized his artistic talent and position, and honored them even in his servitude and pitiable privation. Helplessly and with deep emotion she began to speak haltingly, then stopped and blushed more deeply than before.

The little girl looked at her stealthily from beneath the black tangle of her curls. To conceal her confusion the young woman suddenly bent toward the child with a caress, asking:

"What is your name, little one?"

But the child shrank back and clung closer to the old man, hiding her face against his arm. A smile instantly transfigured the sad, weary face as he laid a hand on the curly head.

With something like bashful friendliness the young woman asked: "This is your little granddaughter, doubtless?"

"Ah, no! She is the daughter of the padrona downstairs. I have never had either wife or child."

He said this with perfect calmness; but to the young bride, so filled with the joy of living, it sounded like a cry of distress, a wail out of the depths of that life of wretchedness, of that utterly joyless existence that had never known prosperity, honor, respect or happiness; void of love, tenderness or troth; from joyless childhood to care-burdened old age, nothing but toil, indigence and utterly abandoned loneliness. And with a revulsion of soul, with something like a recoil of her warm blood from what seemed worse than the gloom of death, she cried passionately:

"Oh, that is not living!"

The old man looked up, touched by the tone of the words which he yet did not comprehend. Her lips were quivering. But the husband laid a cautioning hand on her arm. Then, turning to the workman, he said:

"We will not keep you any longer from your work." And so they departed.

The old man went back to the window and resumed his place at his bench. But for a long time he sat with the graver in his motionless fingers. As the gondola of the strangers had disturbed the still surface of the canal beneath his window whose water had but now so clearly reflected the lofty palaces, the

William M. Lunt, one of the best known automobile salesmen of this city who for the past year and more has been associated with the Pioneer Automobile Company, has joined the sales force of the Studebaker Bros. company under John H. Eagal, manager of the automobile department of the local organization.

Joe Tracey, famous as one of the greatest of automobile racing drivers when that most hazardous of all sports first came into existence and for some years thereafter, and known in the automobile industry as one of the best of automobile engineers, has just purchased a Chalmers-Detroit "30" for his own use.

Fred Swanton, in speaking of the road conditions between San Francisco and Santa Cruz, says that they cannot be beaten for this time of year. Swanton left the St. Francis Hotel at 10:30 Sunday morning for his home in Santa Cruz, going via Colma, Saratoga, Los Gatos and Hotel de Redwood, over the Santa Cruz Mountains, arriving in Santa Cruz at 2:30—four hours for the trip. Mr. Swanton did not break the speed limit at any time, which emphasizes the fact that San Francisco and Santa Cruz are very close together when a Thomas Flyer is the medium of transportation. He has run his car four thousand and eighty miles in the last ninety days, and has the original tires on the car, having had neither tire nor mechanical troubles.

W. L. Houghson, president of the Standard Motor Car Company, accompanied by a party of friends, left recently for an extended tour of the southern part of the state for the purpose of visiting the agents, in that territory, of the Ford cars. The local motorist will be away about ten days and during that time will tour in a new model of a Ford car.

An interesting bit of information was received by the Pioneer Automobile Company Wednesday to the effect that out of over five hundred second hand cars advertised in the Chicago Sunday's Tribune there was one Thomas and that was a nineteen five model. It is quite evident that Chicago people are not anxious to part with their Thomas Flyers.

The following message from the E. R. Thomas Motor Branch of Chicago had just been received by the Pioneer Automobile Company: "Sixty cars in Packers' parade today; eleven were Thomas Flyers."

That the winning car in the coming Los Angeles-Phoenix race, which is scheduled to commence at Los Angeles tonight will cover the course in twenty-five hours or under, is the assertion of Bert Latham who will be at the wheel of the Studebaker E-M-F "30" part of the time. Latham has been trying out his car over the course recently and despite the fact that the roads are reported to be in terrible shape, declares that he expects to pilot his car through in great shape.

The world's record for a half-mile track was broken at Rome, Georgia, a few days ago by a Studebaker E-M-F "30" which made five and one-quarter miles in six minutes fifty-seven and two-fifths seconds. Four popular price gasoline cars were pitted against the little Studebaker.

That Diamond Tires may be found in service in any part of the world where automobiles are used is shown by the Diamond Rubber Company receiving a letter from E. H. Todd in which he writes that with his car which he has used in the stage service around Dawson City, Yukon Territory, he has received some 8,235 miles' service from the Diamond Tires which equipped his machine. He further writes that the mileage was made between April 4 and October 3 of this year and three of the tires are still holding the original air while all four tires are capable of several thousand miles' more service.

The Pioneer Automobile Company, agents for the Thomas, the Chalmers-Detroit, the Hudson and the Randolph truck, did a splendid business at the Auto Show and report having made numerous sales. So many, in fact, as to amply justify the statement that the show has drawn together more actual purchasers who are looking for cars than could have been secured by any other means.

The season of 1910 sees many refinements and improved details in the Buick models which have been so popular the past two seasons, though there are no radical departures from the '09 product, especially in the mechanical construction.

The little Buick "White Streak" with its refinements for 1910 will without doubt continue to hold its enviable position in the public favor, and to create the admiration of all who examine it.

The Buick "40" Roadster, or Model 16, gives a greater range of options for the coming season. It is equipped with 34x4 wheels, front and rear, and may be had with detachable double rear seat, or with a toy-tonneau body of beautiful and attractive lines. The options of color are a rich shade of dark red, or a very dark blue with cream running gear.

In preparation for an increased output of 1910 cars, the Thomas company of Buffalo has broken ground and given out contracts for a large addition to its plant. The new building will be of cement 250x100 feet, and three stories in height.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 24,299, Dept. 12.

ELLA REEVES, Plaintiff,
vs.
JOHN T. REEVES, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to JOHN T. REEVES, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion and wilful neglect, and determining and adjudging that plaintiff is the owner of the certain real property described in the complaint herein, as her separate property, and also for alimony and counsel fees; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 23d day of July, A. D. 1909.

Sayings of the Children

The tendency of most doctrines is to be very narrow, and the loyalty for a particular church is "bred in the bone," as a certain little Memphis boy bears witness. His mother was telling him of the childhood of Christ, and in the course of her story said that Christ was a Jew. The little fellow looked up at her in wide-eyed astonishment, and said in an awed voice: "Why, mother, I always thought that the Lord was a Presbyterian."

After his first visit to a circus, Wallace was walking one evening in a large meadow. Looking all around, he said, in an assured manner: "I know what the world is now—a great big tent. Look, mamma; don't you see how high it is in the middle, and how it comes down all around?" "Yes," the mother said, "it does look somewhat that way, but there is no pole in the middle. What holds it up?" He looked puzzled for a while, then gravely answered: "I 'spect God holds it up on the other side."

Mother (reproving her child for disobedience)—Nobody will love you if you are naughty and disobey me. Child—Grandpa and Satan will.

First Youth—What would you do if a fellow called you a thief? Second Youth—To my face? First Youth—Yes. Second Youth—Why, I'd—er—. About how big a fellow?

Little Beth was watching with the greatest interest the making of a doll. Her mother had bought her one of those "life-size" affairs which come in the form of a large piece of cotton on which the front and rear views of the doll are printed; and Beth was observing with open-mouthed wonderment the operation of cutting out these two printings, sewing them together and stuffing the doll with cotton batting. It was wonderful, Beth thought. Her little tongue was silent, but her wee brain was evidently hard at work. At length the doll was completed, and so, evidently, was Beth's deep thinking for she said slowly and solemnly: "That's the way I was put together before I came to this country."

One day, at the table, mamma and her two children were speaking of the death that day of a sweet baby boy. Mamma had lost a baby girl—Edna—the year before and remarked: "He" (the child who had just died) "and little Edna will play together, now." Leary, mamma's seven-year-old boy said: "Yes, they will be sweethearts." Mamma explained that there would be no sweethearts, no marrying in heaven. With open-eyed astonishment, Leary asked: "Won't there be any men there?"

The children were playing funeral, and Johnny, our four-year-old boy, was chosen as the one to be buried. He was placed in a hammock and taken on the children's shoulders to the grave, made ready for him. The children grouped about the grave were beginning to sing, when to their surprise Johnny joined in. "Stop!" said Mary, "you must not sing; you are dead." "Oh, no," was the ready answer. "It's all right; I am a little angel up in heaven."

George came home from school brimming over with the story of George Washington and his hatchet. This George sometimes wavers from the truth, so his mamma thought it an opportunity for a little object lesson. She asked, "Would my little boy George have told the truth when papa came and found he had cut down the tree?" George thought a moment, then answered earnestly: "I'll tell you, mamma, I wouldn't a been there."

Freddy's mamma had a caller one day, who several times during her stay said: "Now I mnst go," always resuming her seat, nevertheless. Upon another repetition of the remark Freddy said, solemnly, "Don't you believe it until she's gone, mamma."

A Sunday-school teacher in Carthage, Ill., has a class of little girls, and it is her custom to tell them each Sunday of one little incident that has happened in the week, and request the children to quote a verse of scripture to illustrate the story. In this way she hopes to impress the usefulness of Biblical knowledge upon the little ones. One Sunday she told her class of a cruel boy who would catch cats and cut off their tails. "Now, can any little girl tell me of an appropriate verse?" she asked. There was a pause for a few moments, when one little girl arose and in a solemn voice said: "Whatsoever God has joined together let no man put asunder."

Pernicious Newspaper Domination

Some of our tripod savants of the daily press are already betraying symptoms of a feverish desire to instruct and guide aright the gentlemen who have been elected to legislate for the municipality during the years 1910 and 1911. Wherefore if not on bended knees, at any rate in a state of mind bordering on hysterical solicitude, we supplicate the supervisors-elect to put behind them these volunteer but blind guides that never lead anywhere but to the ditch. It is our fervent hope that the supervisors-elect will take counsel of the experience of their predecessors who have been driven out of the temple for a craven subservience to newspaper authority, the cardinal defect of the current dispensation. This proud city has been suffering too long from newspaper domination. It is high time for us to be disillusioned, to realize that the editors of our daily newspapers are physicians who are themselves very much in need of healing. The voice of the press is not the voice of the people in this city. As a matter of fact there is nothing that the people of San Francisco are more ashamed of than their daily newspapers, all of which are the organs of individuals who are not distinguished for energy of consecrated purpose, for civic zeal or for conscience. The editors of these papers are not intellectual giants. They are educated in nothing but the technicalities of their profession. There is not one of them with sufficient ability to conduct a simple mercantile business. Yet the notion has long prevailed that when the utterance of any one of them gets into print it derives the force of revelation and is on the way to become the opinion of the public. The fatuity of this notion has been demonstrated at the polls so often that it is to be wondered at that there should ever be a public official so weak-minded as to pay the slightest attention either to their ecstasies or their lamentations. It is clear that to cultivate their esteem is as irrational as to fear their disfavor. So, now that they are all about to take up problems of popular importance and settle them to their own satisfaction for all time in the interest of the people's peace of mind, why should they be taken seriously by the men who were elected to office last week? Let us hope for an administration of municipal affairs guided and approved by the conscience of the people's servants and entirely free from the demoralizing influence of a selfish and demagogic press.

The New San Francisco

Not a city wide open with Vice flaunting herself in public places, nor yet a city with the lid on echoing to the Psalms of David, but a laughter-loving city affording entertainment and diversion to men and women that are filled with the essential spirit of youth and that are not disposed to wrap themselves in gloom in the presence of immemorial destiny—this is Mayor-elect McCarthy's conception of what the city should be that he has been elected to govern for the next two years. There is nothing of singularity in this conception. Other Mayors have had precisely the same idea but Mr. McCarthy is the first within our recollection to vindicate the courage of his convictions on this subject. For many years our public servants have deemed it prudent to pay lip deference to what they supposed was public opinion with reference to the restrictions that should be imposed upon the citizens of the city. To that end they affected a somewhat puritanical attitude toward certain phases of life which are believed to be repugnant to people of an ascetic temperament, but what they reprobated they complaisantly endured. This attitude like all things hypocritical was productive of evil, for in consequence the night life was regulated on a cash basis and official corruption flourished in a soil made fertile by the zealous champions of morality.

His Salutatory

In an interview that may be properly regarded as his salutatory to the people of San Francisco Mayor-elect McCarthy has sounded the keynote of his administrative policy, and the inspirited heart of the people vibrates responsively thereto. This keynote has a musical cadence that soothes our vague desires and makes strong within us the hope that we shall soon be able to scorn the hate of angry gods that have smitten us in their spleen. San Francisco, the Mayor-elect tells us, has a distinctive individuality, and he is in favor of letting it be developed. San Francisco is a city of temperament, he says, and it should not be made to conform with the principles of life that are suitable to the habits and tastes of the people of a New England village whose ideals are those that came over on the Mayflower. "I am opposed," he says, "to a narrow, strait-laced and puritanical San Francisco"; also, "I do not see why I should strive as Mayor to erect barriers in the path of people who are old enough to know what they want and are gifted with the speech and unity to demand it at a public election." In all the Mayor-elect says there is good sense and a refreshing freedom from pharisaism, the malady with which public office in this city has been too long infected.

The Timeliness of Him

From his salutatory we infer that the Mayor-elect knows that the Decalogue does not prescribe a wax-doll morality. Apparently he has no delusions regarding asceticism. The policy which he has outlined indicates that he is sensible of the fact that tumult, hatred, hypocrisy, the ferocity of self-interest and the tenacity of prejudice are forms of immorality that are much more to be dreaded than those transporting purple sins that give buoyancy to the night life. Aware that virtue is not so dull, nor common sense so tiresome as some people believe, Mayor-elect McCarthy comes to us as the apostle of peace and plenty, of gaiety and good-humor, promising that the sunshine of the future shall chase the shadows of the past. To hear him is to be carried back on the wings of memory to the haunts of youth in the old town that were fashioned for all ecstasy and that palpitated with the joy of living. He comes to us to enfranchise us from puritanism and pharisaism and to press a little gaiety and amiability into the service of goodness. More power to him, say we. No sour ascetic life for us. We applaud the heartening sentiments of the Mayor-elect. There is more poetry in them than in Mayor Taylor's verse. Elected contemporaneously with the discussion by our immaculate supervisors of an ordinance providing for the censoring of the drama, he has come in the nick of time to save us from everlasting humiliation. A man who has shown his grasp of the spirit of things, who is as keenly conscious as he of the manifold diversities of the world and of the right of life to be what it is, may be depended upon to make short work of the dramatic censorship. He may not be a connoisseur of the drama, but undoubtedly he has sense enough to know that what the liberty-loving people of England regard as an intolerable form of oppression is not suitable to this city.

The Languishing Cause of Reform

The cause of municipal reform received a black eye in many cities on election day. New York is the only city in which the reformers triumphed. The chief interest outside of New York centred on the contest in Philadelphia where D. Clarence Gibboney's fight against the McNicol machine ended in a crushing defeat. Gibboney is known as the "Dr. Parkhurst of Philadelphia." He is a reformer of the Francis J. Heney type. He went about during the campaign denouncing his enemies, and representing himself as the people's champion, and the people gave the machine candidate an overwhelming vote. One of the liveliest of municipal contests took place in Cleveland, where Mayor Tom L. Johnson, posing as the enemy of public service corporations, met his Waterloo. Governor Fort's campaign against liquor in Atlantic City ended in the triumph of an incorrigibly "wet" element. Despite President Taft's attitude of hostility toward the Cox machine in Cincinnati that organization whipped the reformers out of their boots. Though Boss Murphy lost in New York City, the Fingy Conners machine triumphed in Buffalo, and so did the Barnes machine in Albany. The results indicate that almost everywhere reformers are in bad odor. Are we to conclude that there is a strong prejudice against reform in this country and an equally strong partiality for the methods of corrupt machine politicians? So humiliating a conclusion we cannot embrace. Because the people are intolerant of self-constituted reformers it does not follow that they approve the methods of machine politicians or that they do not wish to be governed economically and honestly. The probability is that the cause of reform has suffered not so much at the hands of its avowed enemies as at the hands of its pretended friends. Ever since Mr. Roosevelt retired from office indications have been spreading of a change of public sentiment regarding the type of reformers to which as the Chief Magistrate of the country the Mighty Hunter extended his ardent encouragement. Reformers of this type do not wear well. Their standard of goodness is so high that the average citizen despairs of ever being able to reach it, and the more he contemplates it the more he doubts the sincerity of the men who profess to live up to it.

The Futility of Prohibition

When the Prohibition wave was sweeping over the country some months ago we were told that King Alcohol was about to abdicate, that old Demon Rum was tottering to his fall and that the banners of the W. C. T. U. would soon be floating triumphantly over every distillery in the land. The United States was so rapidly going dry that brewers were in a panic, old topers were threatened with a fatal thirst and supply houses saw nothing ahead but bankruptcy. But now comes another story which causes us to wonder whether the enthusiasm of the Prohibitionists and the alarm of the manufacturers and purveyors of wet goods have not been unwarranted. The story comes from that authoritative source of statistical information, the capital at Washington, where the officials of the Internal Revenue Department are puzzled to know what is being done with all the whisky that is coming out of bond. Inasmuch as whisky is not being used as a liquid fertilizer in the farming districts, or serving as a substitute for gasoline as a motive power, the suspicion is strong in the minds of Government officials that the American people are not eschewing the refreshing highball or the stimulating cocktail. Returns made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue show that the withdrawals of whisky from bond in the fiscal year just passed were the largest ever recorded. That this whisky is not being poured into the ocean in deference to the exhortations of the Prohibition propagandists is evident from the fact that Bradstreet and other commercial agencies report a substantial increase in the revenue of whisky dealers. Furthermore we learn that last year the American people were more generous to the Whisky Trust than ever before. The profits of the Trust in that year were ten per cent more than in the year previous. In the circumstances it is obvious that the Demon is in no immediate danger of banishment.

The Neglect of California History

The recent Portola festival has served at least one good purpose. It has called general attention to the ignorance of our own people in the matter of the history of California. The question is being asked why it is that our school children and school graduates, while they are fairly well prepared to answer queries concerning the discovery and settlement of the Atlantic seaboard, apparently believe that California just happened. The answer is simple enough. School histories and geographies have been compiled for the most part by eastern "educators," and published by eastern firms. The California teachers now in charge of the California schools were taught with minute particularization the dates and facts of the discovery and exploration of every cove and indentation of the north Atlantic states and the events of most trifling significance in the early settlements. They learned, with due regard to the credit sheet, the precise number of grains of corn which accompanied the Carver Thanksgiving proclamation and the number of arrows which constituted the challenge of the Indians before King Philip's War. They were drilled on all the minutiae of that and other uprisings which, however important to the colonists involved, were negligible in the history of the world. They know all about the reprehensible Dutch who sailed down the Hudson river and made faces at the pious Connecticut Yankees, and they were on terms of intimacy with the Charter Oak and Penn's Treaty Tree and the Washington Elm. Never a word did they hear of Coronado or Cabrillo or Espejo, and to this day they are ignorant of the fact that battles were fought on the site of San Francisco. Of the doings of Fremont and his army they have never heard. Among the Native Sons and Native Daughters, who are pledged to the preservation of the history and monuments of California, there is some knowledge of California history, but it is confined to oratorical ladies and gentlemen who have made research in quest of material for rounded periods on commemoration days. As the Portola Festival has stimulated interest in the romantic history of the State perhaps the Native Sons and Native Daughters may think it worth while to start an agitation in favor of persuading our school authorities to attend to a matter that has been sadly neglected.

Song by the Lake

My son, my little son, we two will rest
  Beside the water, red in sunset light,
And watch the evening fade, the lake grow grey,
  Until the moon's enchantment fills the night.

Who knows what sombre Fate stands near us now,
  What rich-robed Destiny no eye may scan,
What scented-sandalled Love? Ah, son of mine,
  Play not with Love when you are grown a man.

Feign nothing, and love greatly when you love
  And, having chosen, till the end be true;
So shall one woman out of all the world
  Keep faith in man through keeping faith in you.

For women walk the shadowed ways of life,
  Their hearts know sorrow and they are afraid.
Creatures of hope and high expectancy
  They dress the bier on which their joy is laid.

The world says: Promise little and no thought
  Of faith unfaithful holds you from your sleep.
So rots the world. Nay, rather be it yours
  To promise greatly—and your promise keep.

Night comes, the moon is full, the quiet lake

"I haven't heard," says the Hon. James D. Phelan, "whether Mr. Heney intends going back to the Federal service." Mr. Heney has no more chance of getting into the Federal service again than has Mr. William J. Burns. So far as the service is concerned they are outcasts.

Patrick H. McCarthy, Mayor-Elect

Being a Brief Review of the Chief Incidents in the Career of the Labor Leader Who Will Govern This City for Two Years, With Some Piquant References of His to Local Celebrities.

By Robert McTavish

Patrick H. McCarthy who will succeed Dr. Taylor as Mayor of San Francisco, is a self-made man and if he is unduly proud of his maker, the feeling does not come aggressively to the surface when he discourses of his life history. McCarthy is not one of those men who delight in the manipulation of lights and shadows whenever they are called upon to describe their careers; he does not superexalt the present by deepening the gloom of the past. I imagine that the past was never a gloomy present to McCarthy, but that his gradual rise, stepping-stone by stepping-stone, until he has reached the highest office in a big city has only kept pace with an expanding consciousness of his own powers. The interviewer who goes to the mayor-elect, hoping to get the conventional tale of a self-made man will be disappointed. McCarthy either does not know the formula or else he despises it. It is apparent from his account of his life that he has always regarded himself as a man of great importance in his environment; that he is convinced that he has in nowise risen above his station but has simply forced recognition from those whom he regards not as his superiors but as his peers; and that he will experience no difficulty in meeting the millionaire captain of industry, the European ambassador or any other of the great upon what he considers an equal footing. If McCarthy does not possess an innate conviction of the dignity of labor I am mistaken; and if he does not think that as a leader of labor he is entitled to as much honor and consideration as a leader of capital or of literature or of a nation, for that matter, I am doubly in error. If these premises are sound, McCarthy will feel no need of rising to his new dignity; he is perfectly conscious of being on a par with it. To McCarthy's mind, I believe, the situation is this: the mayoralty will bring no honor to McCarthy but he will bring new honor to the mayoralty.

McCarthy is a native of Ireland, having been born in Limerick "of the violated treaty" in 1863. To what station he was born I do not know, but as he left the little green isle at an early age to try his fortune in America, it may be presumed that he came of that sturdy peasant stock poorly endowed with the world's goods but rich in energy and temporal courage.

Before he had reached his majority McCarthy was prominently identified with the labor movement in St. Louis. No doubt it was no mere accident which enabled McCarthy to find his metier at that early age; even his bitterest enemies—and he is plentifully endowed therewith—have never denied his capacity as an organizer of union men. He took part in a movement which resulted in the formation of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, an organization in which there are today probably not less than 200,000 members.

Casual reference has been made to McCarthy's enemies and it may be interesting to note here that in the fierce fights which have been made in this city to destroy his influence with union labor and with politicians, the city of St. Louis has more than once been fine-combed for evidence of any illegitimate transactions in which McCarthy might have participated. The silence of his newspaper enemies indicates quite conclusively that they have never found anything of this description.

McCarthy came to this city in 1886 and being a union carpenter, joined local number 22 which at that time had between 400 and 500 members. He was quickly recognized as a leader and was made president of the union, an office which he held for seven consecutive terms. Between 1886 and 1894 the cause of unionism languished in California, the principal reason being, according to McCarthy, that certain union men obtained the eight hour day through mutual agreement between the workers and the employers and promptly began to disregard the broad principles of labor combination. The result was that in 1894, again according to McCarthy, there were only 248 union carpenters in the State, 148 of these belonging to local number 22 and the balance being thinly scattered throughout other locals around the bay.

Considering the condition of unionism, that particular time may not have seemed the most auspicious for the launching of a widespread union movement, but nevertheless it was the time which McCarthy selected for the organization of the Building Trades Council of San Francisco..

"With a number of others," says McCarthy, "I instituted the Building Trades Council, but I was too busy organizing the different departments of the building trades along union lines to assume the presidency. In 1897 I became the president of this organization and have held that position ever since. Only once have I been compelled to struggle to remain in the presidency. In 1899 the mill-owners, fearing the spread of the eight-hour day, tried to work up feeling against me as president. They got some few votes in the council but I beat them out and after a fight of six months I obtained the eight-hour day for the mills."

So great was the success of McCarthy and his associates in the organization of the men employed locally in the building industry, that in 1901 they broadened

A Plea for Our Patriots

Based Upon the Theory That it is Our Duty to Exert Ourselves to Vindicate the World's Opinion of Us and Thus Rescue From Oblivion the Distinguished Leaders of a Forlorn Hope

By Apemantus

With something of the lassitude that succeeds an orgy I withdrew from the obsequies that were solemnized by a whole city last week murmuring to myself, "May they rest in peace!" Since then I have been reading the valedictory of William J. Burns, the renowned hero of the gumshoe brigade, the sweet-scented darling of the Ladies' League of Justice, and as a result I have brought a sumptuous variety of reflections to a subject that has been uppermost in the minds of the citizenry for fully three years, and which perhaps should not be banished summarily at this propitious juncture in our affairs. To these reflections I will endeavor to give expression, not so much for the purpose of edifying my readers as to impress them with the drab unsatisfactoriness of the somewhat jejune and sterile situation that has succeeded a protracted period of dramatic and diverting vicissitudes; nor is it so much my purpose to work on the minds of others as to ease my own. By way of further preface I will assure my readers that I harbor no feeling of resentment against our ingenious but futile uplifters whose despotic reign came to an inglorious end on election day. It is only the narrow soul, say I, that knows not the godlike glory of forgiving.

Now to come to the point with but little more illuminating circumlocution: Are we to permit the sacrosanct ones whose obsequies we so lately solemnized to sink into the gulf of dark forgetfulness or drift hopelessly on the turbid stream of oblivion? If monstrous ingratitude, the abridgement of all baseness, is to be the reward of aggressive virtue, if men of public spirit, animated with zeal for the welfare of mankind are to be condemned to eternal obscurity, how is the civic weal ever to be advanced? Surely we owe something to the memory of these heroes of reform. We owe it in our own interest if not in theirs, for to abandon them to communion with themselves—an awful fate—is to make it appear that public virtue is a sinister gift and its attendant glory but a madding and mocking shadow. If, lacking a Pindar, we cannot celebrate our heroes in the joyous and glowing images of a choral ode; if we are forbidden to apotheosize our martyrs; if we cannot obtain niches for them in a Hall of Fame; if, I say, these things are impossible we can at least rescue the deeds of the fallen from myth and fable; we can truthfully record their activities for the inspiration of posterity and supply suitable material for songs to be sung by old women for the quieting of little children.

Now if the glorious sentiment of gratitude is not sufficiently strong in this matter, or if an appeal to kindly Hesychia, daughter of Justice, that maketh cities great, be in vain, at any rate we ought to be roused out of our apathy by the vehement and resounding valedictory of that eminent spy William J. Burns which discloses his intention of withdrawing himself from green fields and luxuriant pastures where prosperity has long encompassed him. This valedictory is in characteristic vein. It is the impassioned outburst of a heart overflowing with rancor. Fuming with rage at the prospect of being separated from the Spreckels leg, vertiginous with emotion as he realizes that he must soon withdraw his prehensile fist from the pockets of our incredibly indulgent taxpayers, the great expert in "frameups" levels against the whole community the familiar accusation that has been the staple of his vaporings ever since he came to town. Every time a jury has disagreed Spy Burns has explained that somebody was bribed, and Francis J. Heney has never failed to lift his melodious voice in corroboration. Nobody ever got on a jury in a graft case that was not pronounced acceptable both by Heney and Burns, and though the juries were kept in the custody of the sheriff some person who must have exercised far more ingenuity than Burns was capable of succeded in seducing them. This is the thrilling tale, the damnable iteration of which has been vexing the ears of drowsy men for three years, and now we hear it again, this time the sensational allusion being not to a jury but to the electorate of the whole city. San Francisco abounds in corruption, according to Spy Burns; it is so far devoid of a sense of decency that it bartered its vote on election day; and to give color of truth to an otherwise bald and unconvincing narrative the distinguished sleuth boasts a knowledge of the sum that it cost the higher-ups to debauch us. It was exactly one million dollars.

Now what Spy Burns says about us will not tax the credulity of people in foreign parts who have kept in touch with our affairs through the amiable ministrations of Mr. Fremont Older, the Chief of the Publicity Bureau, whose duty it has been to cultivate the friendship and stimulate the energies of muckrakers in all parts of the country. As a result of the stories disseminated through the agency of the Boughten Bulletin's talented editor, the ante-election preconceptions of people all over this broad land regarding us were such that indubitably they swallowed whole the plausible explanation of Francis J. Heney's defeat made by his distinguished collaborator. Everywhere the belief prevails that we cast out our virtuous uplifters because of our desire to wallow and welter in corruption. Everywhere we are regarded as an abandoned community, the Babylonian bawd of the Republic. This may be the kind of reputation that we wish to enjoy, but if so we should attest our gratitude to the men to whom we are indebted; and to be adequately sensible of the measure of their beneficence we should conduct an investigation through the regularly constituted channels and inform ourselves of the amazing things that have been done to redeem us from iniquity.

There was a time some months ago when the graft prosecutors themselves, eager for a certificate of character, courted an investigation. That was the time that Mayor Taylor, receiving an inspiration for which he was in no sense indebted to the divine Muses, appointed a committee to investigate the doings of his mentors. The opera bouffe flavor of this incident appealed to the risibles of all of us, but in those parlous days, during every minute of which Machiavel was taking on the complexion of a saint, nobody could be found with sufficient nerve to crack a smile. Why that committee never reported nobody has been informed, but the supposition is that in the course of time the graft prosecutors themselves, realizing that public credulity was being ezhausted, became afraid of their own "frameups." The committee in all probability never will report. Therefore we shall have to look to some other body for light. In my opinion the proper body to conduct an investigation of this kind is a grand jury, one impaneled by an honest district attorney, one that will have the leisure and the zeal to scrutinize all that has been done by the gentlemen who have succeeded in getting themselves recognized abroad as the only honest citizens in San Francisco. Tolerably familiar am I with the methods and practices of the gentlemen who have been uplifting us, and I have not the slightest hesitation in assuring the District Attorney-elect that an investigation such as I have suggested will not only insure our civic patriots against oblivion but cause them to live in the archives of their beloved city if not somewhere more conspicuous. For the purposes of such investigation it will not be necessary to grant immunity to anybody. There are flaming records that speak for themselves without prompting, without fear of the ominous reproaches of spies or pettifoggers. If Mr. Fickert should deem the suggestion worthy of his attention, it would be well for him to keep track not only of Mr. William J. Burns but of some other distinguished individuals who are yet to be properly celebrated.

Simon's Father

Translated from Guy de Maupassant by Alec Clark

The last stroke of noon had sounded, the school door was flung open, and the children poured out, jostling one another in their eagerness to escape as quickly as possible. But instead of dispersing rapidly and going home to dinner, as was their custom, they kept pausing, gathering into groups and holding whispered conversations.

La Blanchotte's son, Simon, had that morning come to school for the first time.

They had all heard talk of la Blanchotte at home; and although she was well enough received in public, the mothers were in the habit of mentioning her name with a kind of contemptuous pity, which made its impression on the children without their understanding its reason.

As for Simon, they did not know him, for he never came out to join their play in the village streets or by the riverside. Thus they had no particular liking for him, and it was with a measure of joy, mingled with considerable surprise, that they had heard certain words which they kept repeating from one to the other. The words had been said by a boy of fourteen or fifteen, whose sly winks indicated that he had known all about it for a long time; he had said: "Oh, Simon!—well—you know, he hasn't got a father."

Simon in turn appeared at the school door. He was a child of seven or eight years, very pale, very neat, of appearance so timid as almost to seem awkward.

He was turning towards his mother's house, when the groups of his schoolmates gathered about him little by little, till in the end he was completely surrounded. They had never ceased to whisper, and they looked on him with the cruel and pitiless eyes of children who meditate an evil stroke. There Simon stood, planted in the middle of them, surprised and embarrassed, not understanding what they wanted with him. But the boy who had brought the news, puffed up by the success he had already obtained, demanded: "Hallo, youngster, what's your name?"

"Simon," came the reply.

'Simon what?" rejoined the other.

"Simon," repeated the child in confusion.

"Simon," cried the other, "Simon—that's no name—it must be Simon something."

And the child, on the verge of tears, replied for the third time, "My name is Simon."

The urchins around him began to laugh. The triumphant questioner raised his voice: "There, you see, he hasn't got a father."

There was a momentary silence. The children were stupefied by this extraordinary thing—a boy without a father—monstrous! impossible! They looked askance at him as an unnatural being; and they felt arising within them that hitherto unexplained despite which their mothers displayed towards la Blanchotte.

Simon was resting against a tree to keep himself from falling. He was motionless, as though overwhelmed by a disaster beyond repair. He wished to clear his position; but he knew not what to reply, or how to disprove the horrible charge that he had no father. Finally, beside himself he cried out impulsively, "Yes, I have one."

"Where is he?" asked the tormentor.

Simon could not answer: he did not know. The others, wild with glee, burst out laughing. They were children of the fields, with much of the wild beast in their nature; they were possessed by that same spirit which makes the fowls in a poultry-yard hasten to peck to death one of their number which has met with an injury. All at once Simon's eyes fell on a little neighbor, a widow's son, whom he had always seen alone with his mother, just like himself. "You haven't got a father," he said, "any more than I have."

"Oh, yes, I have," replied the other.

"Where is he?" retorted Simon.

"He is dead," declared the other with magnificent pride, "he is in the cemetery; that's where my father is."

A murmur of approbation ran through the scapegrace crew, as though the fact of having a father dead and in the cemetery had conferred a special honor on their comrade, so as to abase yet more this other, who had no father at all. And the little wretches—whose fathers were for the most part evildoers, drunkards, thieves, wifebeaters—jostled into one another and pressed closer and closer, as though they, the legitimate, wished to crush the life out of this being who had no lawful place in the world.

Suddenly the one who was nearest Simon thrust out his tongue with a leer, and cried: "Hasn't got a father, hasn't got a father!"

Simon threw himself on the boy, gripped his hair with both hands, and madly kicked his shins, at the same time trying to bite him. Then came a terrific commotion. The two combatants were separated, and Simon felt himself cuffed, torn, battered, rolled underfoot in the midst of the shrieking circle of ragamuffins. When he regained his feet he began mechanically to brush his little blouse, all filthy with dust. Someone shouted at him, "Go and tell your father."

Then he felt a great sinking of the heart. They were stronger than he, they had beaten him, and he could not answer them, for he knew that in truth he had no father. Pride alone buoyed him up, and for some seconds he sought to struggle against the tears which were trying to burst forth. He felt a choking, then he began to weep silently, and great sobs shook his frame.

At this his enemies burst into ferocious glee, and by natural instinct, like savages in their terrible merry-making, they joined hands and began to dance in a circle around him, repeating as a refrain, "Hasn't got a father! Hasn't got a father!" . . .

But all at once Simon ended his sobbing: an access of fury had seized upon him. Beneath his feet were some loose stones; he picked them up, and with all his force hurled them at his tormentors. Two or three were struck and ran away crying, and so formidable was Simon's appearance that the others were infected with panic. A crowd is always cowardly in the presence of an angry man, and they scattered in flight.

The fatherless child was left alone. He started running towards the fields, for something had come back to his memory and had quickened a great resolution in his spirit. He would drown himself in the river.

What he had remembered was that, a week before, a miserable beggar had thrown himself into the water because he had come to the end of his money. Simon had seen him dragged out. The poor creature had ordinarily seemed wretched, filthy, and repulsive; but what had struck Simon about the dead man was his tranquil appearance as he lay there with pale cheeks, long and dripping beard, and calm, wide-open eyes. "He is dead," someone had remarked; and another had added, "Well he is happy now." And Simon also was determined to drown himself because he had no father, like the poor wretch who had no money.

He had arrived at the brink and stood watching the flow of the water. Fishes were playing about, swiftly darting through the clear stream, and now and then one would make a little leap to catch the flies dancing above the surface. Simon was deeply interested; he watched and forgot his tears. But, like the gusts of wind

A Grotesque Allegory

A Cheveril Conscience who had been the faithful servitor of a Civic Patriot for lo, these many years, having been summarily dismissed expressed much amazement, observing how incredible it was that the gentleman should expect to find a worthy substitute.

"I have gratified your every whim," he said. "I have made it possible for you to play the rogue and hypocrite without scruple; I have acquiesced in all your dissembling, in all your preposterous pretensions, in all your prodigious infernalities. For your sake I have been immune to compunction, insensible to every principle of decency. During all the years of my service you have kept me stretched to the highest tension without evoking a protest. Now I pray you, do me the favor to tell me why you have thus cast me off."

And the Civic Patriot made answer: "Because you are no longer of any use to me. Your flexibility is all gone. You are worn out."

With this cruel reply ringing in his ears the Cheveril Conscience withdrew from the presence of his ungrateful master, and slowly wended his way out of the great city in whose affairs he had played a conspicuous part. It was night, and the people of the city were in a merry mood, for that they had held an election the result of which filled their hearts with much gladness. Just beyond the borders of the city the Cheveril Conscience turned to take a farewell look at the scene of his professional triumphs, and much to his astonishment the city was lighted as though by the glow of a Titanic furnace. A great conflagration, he thought, was sweeping over the city; but just at that moment an automobile approached and the chauffeur explained that the ladies of the Heney League having for the first time seen themselves as others see them were blushing in concert.

Looking Backward

Even when the distance is not sufficient to lend enchantment to the view looking backward is sometimes one of the most pleasant of diversions. What could be more grateful to senses properly attuned than a comprehensive glance backward and into the abysm of curious happenings which but a few weeks ago were filling us with the most profound concern, and which in the perspective are conducive only to laughter raucous and ribald. I allude of course to the incidents of the stirring drama upon which an asbestos curtain was rung down last week amid the shrill jeers of the fickle and jaded multitude. The actors have passed off the stage and into history. They now have a keen sense of the tragic melancholy of existence. For them the sand is turned, the hour is past, the harvest is unreaped; in their ears has sounded the knell of their illusions. What a pompous lot they were as they strutted their brief hour on the stage! With what fantastic tricks they made the angels grin! Towering above all of them in the full length of his amazing conceit, there looms before the mind's eye—who? The Hon. Francis J. Heney? Guess again. Beside this portentous figure the arrogant little prosecutor is dwarfed to the size of a peanut. The swaggering personage is the Hon. Hiram Johnson, the man that sent the message to Taft—the awful message of defiance. As he stood on the platform, sawing the air with his grandiloquent fists and assuring the groundlings that he wanted the President of the United States to know that to him he owed no allegiance, being still true to Terrible Teddy, what a striking resemblance he bore to the fellow that defied the lightning. Is it not harrowing to think of President Taft's feelings when he heard how Hiram Johnson stood?

The Hale Oracle

Looking backward I see Marshall Hale of the ribbon counter, a mighty tradesman, familiarly known as a prominent cit., on the eve of election making up his massive mind for publication in his favorite journal the Boughten Bulletin. At the eleventh hour the whole city presumably had the capacious porches of its ear extended to receive the paramount tidings of how Marshall Hale intended to vote. As Marshall Hale leans in matters of State so leans the whole city. Hence the far-flung porches of the popular ear on the eve of the election. Marshall Hale is a man of great intellect. He knows calico from cambric, a hawk from a handsaw. Besides he has almost as much culture as Harris Weinstock who reforms in San Francisco and edifies the Pshawtalkqua circle of the whole State. When the Boughten Bulletin, which has first call on the Hale produce, announced that the great man had made up his mind and that Leland was his choice, everybody went home to bed satisfied, everybody but the man who winds up the ferry clock, and he gravely asked, "Who in hell is Marshall Hale?"

Enter Boke

Not conspicuous at the close of the campaign, but in it with all his heart was Professor Boke, the intrepid purifier of Berkeley, a man of fine parts who casts his luminous and penetrating mind into the very midst and marrow of sociological problems. He has done many things for his own high glory and profit and the good of the country. Boke is a man to be loved. Not to love Boke is to be insensible of the charms of an engaging personality. But nobody can love Boke more than Boke loves Heney. Boke worships Heney. The pedestal on which Boke has placed Heney is so tall that the fine figure of Boke's object of adoration is lost in the empyrean. Boke's passion for Heney is so strong that he recently christened his helpless son Francis J. Heney Boke. And to this day he shows no signs of recanting. The question may be asked, but I will not answer: "Why should a father be permitted to exercise so sinister a power over his own child?"

His Last Theatrical Stunt

If our dramatic critics are to be believed it is not unusual for legitimate comedy to degenerate into farce. But whether or not the dramatic critics are worthy of credence, it is certain that the wind-up of our comedie humaine was farce of the most grotesque and extravagant character. By way of proof of this assertion I will describe the last scene of the last act in which the chief protagonist of the play had the stage centre and the limelight all to himself. In this scene the invincible hero, Francis J. Heney, vindicated the completeness of his citizenship in the Republic of Tommyrot. Time 2 p. m., election day; place, a polling booth. Enter, Mr.

Heney. He steps blithely down the centre and calls for a ballot. At this moment a gumshoe artist seizes his arm and whispers in his ear that a newspaper photographer who had been waiting ever since the booth opened to take the picture of the "next" District Attorney in the act of casting his vote had gone home. Mr. Heney smiles and refrains from voting. A hurry call is sent to the office of the newspaper photographer. Here suspense seizes the audience. The dramatic intensity of the situation is tremendous. From the working of Mr. Heney's plastic facial muscles it is apparent that he has resolved to show a great light to the public; the light that he discerned in the clear and sensitive vision of experience, the light that guided him through his campaign. Time hurries on with all its usual celerity, but Mr. Heney patiently watches its flight, and the audience sits open-mouthed, eager for developments. Three o'clock strikes. Mr. Heney is still waiting for the photographer. "They also serve who only stand and wait," says Milton. How true of Heney while he was close to the leg. To hold on, to hold fast, is to be patient and patience is genius. Heney proved that he had it while waiting to have his picture taken for publication. At 4 o'clock he was still waiting, as though persuaded that he that can have patience can have what he will. A half hour after four footsteps are heard approaching. Patience is rewarded. He comes,—the photographer. He poses Mr. Heney with a ballot in his hand, and the impressive picture is on the way to publication, but just as the curtain goes down it is intercepted by the heavy villain impersonated by the public who order the photograph sent to the rogue's gallery.

To the Vanishing Poet

One of the romantic figures of the approximate past still lags superfluous on the stage, musing with himself, apparently oblivious of his surroundings, and insensible of the fact that the curtain is down. To this quaint personage an occasional correspondent taking the liberty to paraphrase the lines of a living poet addresses these mournful sentiments:

Farewell to my Taylor, farewell to the singer
Whose tender effusions my aunts used to sing;
Farewell, for the fame of the bard will not linger,
This passionate minstrel's no longer the thing.

But though on his temples has faded the laurel,
Though broken the lute, and though veiled is the crest,
Old, Fuzzy at worst is uncommonly moral,
Which is more than some good poets are at their best.

Mr. Billingsgate on Bacon

"For my name and memory, I leave it to men's charitable speeches, to foreign nations and to the next ages." Thus wrote Francis Bacon, the most learned philosopher of modern times, a man to whom the world owes a prodigious debt of gratitude. Mankind acknowledges the debt, and despite his pathetic weaknesses reveres the memory of the author of Novum Organum; the touching sentiment so humbly expressed in his will is respected wherever there is a spark of charity, wherever men are sufficiently unhypocritical to make no pretension to freedom from sin. Did I say mankind? One dissenting voice is heard. It is the voice of the man who signed a receipt for $25,000 about which he does not dare to open his venom-dripping jaws. At a meeting of the Police Commission last Tuesday evening Francis Bacon was quoted by an attorney, whereupon the man who exposed the shame of Morris Haas exclaimed, "Is that the Bacon who was convicted of accepting bribes?" The inference is obvious. In the opinion of the immaculate Mr. Heney Francis Bacon is beyond the pale. Francis Bacon did accept bribes but he confessed. When is Mr. Heney going to come through with reference to that mysterious receipt?

Why Bell Suported Leland

One of the mild surprises of the late noisome campaign was the apparition on the groaning bema of that swaggering representative of the boisterous forces of virtue and vituperation, the Hon. Theodore Bell of Napa. The question was repeatedly asked, What induced this eccentric cow-path statesman to converge from the fragrant boskage of the vine-clad hills of his native township and seek to animate Dr. Leland's inflammatory but not infectious canvass? His admirers have made answer that he was impelled by his fatal passion for rumpling things and throwing a shriek into the proceedings. He came to town, they say, with his reserve and surplus of political sagacity, with his command of all the platitudes of the copybook to gratify the popular taste for red-hot stuff

CALIFORNIA EXILES AT THE WALDORF-ASTORIA

During Portola week the Californians in New York enjoyed a banquet at the big metropolitan hostelry. Many men who have left their impress on San Francisco line were in attendance, among them Henry Varian, Charles J. Brooks, Joe Grismer, Colvin Brown, David Rich, Zenas U. Dodge, C. E. Grunsky, Elmer De Pue and Colonel Kowalsky.

and shock the clapperclawing groundlings into recognition of his talents by means of his sheet iron thunder. This answer may satisfy the yokels of the interior who regard Bell as an inspiring orator, but the truth of the matter is somewhat more interesting. The fact is, I am told, Bell took the stump for Leland at the suggestion of Gavin McNab. This may be regarded as incredible by persons who remember that Bell turned the corner on McNab in the last gubernatorial campaign, and who know that the Democratic boss is slow to place confidence in anybody whom he has had reason to distrust. But the luring of Bell to San Francisco for the purpose of having him excite the hostility of organized labor should not be regarded as an act of friendship on McNab's part. I am told that Bell was advised that it was to his interest to compass the defeat of his friend McCarthy because, if elected, the labor leader would become a candidate for Governor. This is the explanation of Bell's zeal for Leland. And now that Bell is worse off than ever Gavin McNab is not all displeased with the result of his strategy. A few more years in politics and the young man from Napa will begin to learn the rudiments of the game.

"I hear that Jones wants to get a divorce from his rich wife."
"Yes, he was only temporarily embarrassed when he married her."

The Battle of Fizz Water

When Creasy or his editor brings out another edition of the "Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World" he should include an account of the Battle of Fizz Water with the other big engagements which were fought at Arbela and Tours and Hastings and Blenheim and Waterloo. The battle of Fizz Water is being contested right here and now on the stricken field of San Francisco and let me tell you, the cannonade of popping corks is terrific. I am not going to set myself up as the Xenophon of this champagne war, because the issue is still undecided and the perspective of history must soften some of the outlines of the struggle before justice may be done to all the participants. But one incident of this tremendous engagement I shall narrate; it was in fact the corkscrew, if I may be indulged in figurative language, which let loose the bubbles of broil and fizzed the frappe passions of the gladiators. Be it known that the epochal battle commenced when a horde of wine-agents came galloping into town for the Portola, like Attila pounding along the Appian Way to the gates of Rome. King Edward the first of the house of Greenway and Mumms watched their approach from his castellated battlements and sent forth his trusty seneschal, Joe Murphy, to reconnoiter and report. The report was satisfactory and Mumms held its own during the preliminary engagement of Portola week.

They Stole a March on Greenway

But that preliminary engagement was a wearing one for King Edward and he decided that he would hie him to New York to recuperate for a month or so, leaving Murphy in charge of the defenses until the opening of the winter campaign. Alas for the king's strategy! No sooner had Greenway waved a graceful adieu to his sorrowing friends and retainers from the observation platform of the limited than the Pommery people, having dropped the erstwhile favorite Caffery, sent for Joe Murphy and seduced him from his allegiance. The price of his vinous treason to Greenway is variously stated at from $1000 to $1200 a month, a goodly advance on his salary with the Mumms people. The temptation was too much for Murphy and he joined the Pommery forces after wiring Greenway the customary thirty days' notice. Greenway got the dire intelligence just as he was embarking on a vacation which, he intended, should include no more champagne than he absolutely desired to drink, and it almost floored him. Yes, in sorrow be it said, the king of the vintages was nearly floored. There was reason for his consternation. Greenway, be it whispered, is growing old and can no longer drink wine all night as in the good old days; so he leaned on Joe Murphy whose capacity is still unimpaired, as on a crutch. It was pleasant for Greenway to desert the field at midnight and to feel, as he taxied to the hammam bath, that Murphy was capable of maintaining the battle of the beverages until sunrise. But it is difficult to find a lieutenant of Murphy's powerful receptive ability and it may be imagined how poor Greenway felt when Murphy deserted to the enemy. But the king is not by any means at the end of his resources and I shall be pleased to chronicle the future developments of this struggle for the delectation of my readers. Of course my accounts will be fragmentary, for I intend to reserve the whole story for the next decade when it will make a book worthy of comparison with "The Napoleon of Notting Hill."

When the Sleepers Wakened

Speaking of the champagne war, I dropped in at "The Traveling Salesman" at the Van Ness one night last week and the audience being small, I had no difficulty in picking out the people I knew. One of the first I noticed was Billy O'Connor, the critic and esthete who is the agent for "the widdy's" vintage. In another part of the theatre I saw Mackenzie, a Pommery man who is out here from the East to direct the fortunes of the war I have been speaking of. Just then who should lumber down the aisle with a very beautiful girl but Joe Murphy. I was just about to look around for more wine men when I was struck by a most peculiar phenomenon. Billy O'Connor was asleep, Mackenzie was asleep and just as soon as he had settled into a seat beside his fair companion, Joe Murphy went to sleep too. I was speculating as to whether the tsetse fly had bitten all the wine agents in town when one of the players arose, (it was during the poker scene), with a glass in his hand to propose a toast. At once all the wine men awoke and took notice. And I mused: "What a wonderfully developed instinct! What a remarkable faculty for being 'on the job' when drink is the topic of discussion!"

Jack Reynolds' Change of Luck

I am glad to chronicle good tidings of Jack Reynolds who is known in Nevada as the Beau Brummel of Tonopah and in this city as a thoroughly decent and likable young chap. Reynolds had a hard time of it with all his investments and was almost in despair of ever overcoming his streak of ill luck. His mining ventures were miserably unsuccessful; he owed $25,000 to a broker in this city; hardly knew at dinner time how he would pay for his breakfast; and worst of all, was attached to a girl whom he did not dare, in his straitened circumstances, to propose to. That was only a short time since. The other day the goddess of luck decided that he had suffered long enough. His oil-well in a despised section of Bakersfield proved a gusher and is now producing about 500 barrels a day; his mining leases all turned into gold; a relative died and left him $100,000; and the girl of his choice made the appropriate reply when he wired his heart and hand. Reynolds is a general favorite and I felicitate him, at the same time hoping most sincerely that his good luck will continue henceforth forever and a day.

The Countess of Cardigan's Memoirs

A titled lady to whom William Watson's epithet of "the woman with the serpent's tongue" might most appropriately be applied is the Countess of Cardigan whose recently published memoirs have created a decided furore on both sides of the Atlantic. This personage bears an honored name. She is a member of the de Horsey family and her first husband was that brilliant soldier who led the charge of the Light Brigade at Balaklava. After Cardigan's death she married Lord de Lancastre. Scandal breathed the most odious imputations against her character, with what justice may be judged from the fact that the doors of all the leading families of England have long been closed against her. How much truth there may be in the shocking stories told with so much relish in her memoirs I do not know; some of them have the air of verity while others seem wildly improbable. Of course the book has been eagerly seized upon by the coprophilists of this country and England; any book which King Edward would endeavor to suppress would be sure of exactly the same vogue. All sorts of denunciations have been leveled at the author by the English reviewers but for scathing treatment, commend me to the following brief reference in the Saturday Review under the caption of "the declasee's revenge":

The Declassee's Revenge

"Lady Cardigan has revenged herself upon a society which refused to receive her by inventing a series of scandalous libels upon some of its members who are dead. The great ladies whose chacarters she takes away would no more have spoken to Lady Cardigan than to one of

> 'Those pedestrian Paphians who abound
> In London when the daylight's o'er.'

With one exception the stately homes whose interiors Lady Cardigan pretends to depict resolutely closed their doors upon a woman who, with every advantage of birth and fortune, chose to defy not only morality but decency. The stories told by this doting declassee have not even the excuse of wit; they are gross and brutal, but not in the least amusing. Of course, the fiction that Disraeli ever thought of marrying for her money a woman whom everybody cut is ludicrous. We understand that the book has had a great sale, at which we are not prudish enough to affect surprise. Most people like scandal about Queen Elizabeth, even when they know it to be untrue. The harm done by such a book is great. Not only are the relatives of the libeled dead annoyed, but the picture of Victorian society is accepted as true by those who do not know it. The most revolting passages are pounced upon by the halfpenny newspapers, and greedily read and repeated by the enemies of aristocracy. We cannot exonerate from blame the publishers who have published such a book for the sake of gain."

Frankie Was Furious

A somewhat bizarre incident of the Bar Association's banquet Tuesday night altogether escaped the attention of the reporters. The incident was precipitated by that impulsive celebrity Judge Frankie Dunne, who intended that it should be dramatic, but who lacked the force and capacity to make it anything but grotesque and ludicrous. Learning that among the guests of the Bar Association was an attorney from the interior who has expressed the opinion that he should be removed from the bench Judge Dunne bore down upon him with mincing gait, called him a few saucy names and hurried away. The gentleman was so astonished by this hooligan performance that he did not realize what had happened until the fussy jurist had safely ensconced himself among some of his admirers. The judge's rococo behaviour excited the indignation of some of the members of the Association, who felt that so wanton and boorish an effort to affront a guest should not go unrebuked, but they were dissuaded from taking the matter more seriously than ordinarily they would take the judge himself.

A Significant Transfer

The estate of the late Claus Spreckels appears to be going through a process of ramification these days, the object of which is not hard to conjecture in view of the efforts of Mr. John D. Spreckels to get his hands on some of his fond father's property. The other day, without exciting the curiosity of any of the dailies, Mrs. Anna Spreckels, widow of the Sugar King, transferred her share in the community property to the San Cristina Realty Company. This is a corporation of modest and recent birth. It has hardly any history. It came into existence without causing the slightest ripple on the surface of things. Its incorporators were not men of sufficient importance to cause anybody to speculate as to their plans. But now that the company has come into possession of a large fortune in real estate the supposition is that the capital stock is controlled by certain members of the Spreckels family who are not in sympathy with the aims of the two brothers who are intent upon having Claus Spreckels' will declared invalid. By the transfer that has been made the property has been virtually taken out of the hands of the court. It is represented so far as the court is concerned by stock in the realty company. It will not be subject to court orders. From this latest move it is to be inferred that Mrs. Anna Spreckels is entirely in sympathy with her sons Rudolph and Augustus.

"My Wife's Gone to the Club, Hooray"

I met one of our millionaires in the early hours of the morning a few days ago, imbibing copiously of liquid refreshments and far from home. I was surprised. This gentleman, I thought, had deserted the night life for good and all in favor of devotion to his very beautiful wife whose social position is unimpeachable. So I drew him aside from the rather boisterous throng of devotees at the shrine of Bacchus and asked him the reason of his unwonted indulgence. "My wife's gone to the club, hooray, hooray," he intoned with enthusiasm and it was some time before I extracted any further information from him. But when I did, it proved to be of a startling nature. I learned for the first time that one of our most exclusive women's clubs has adopted strictly masculine methods of administration. The result is that the women who are fortunate enough to belong to this organization may drop into its luxurious quarters at any hour of the night to find a game of bridge in full swing, and if the thrall of the cards holds them too long and it is out of the question to go home, they are accommodated with sleeping quarters for the night. If that is not the most decidedly up-to-date wrinkle of pamered femininity you may fillip me with a three-man beetle. No wonder my millionaire was making a night of it. His wife was doing the same, so why should he not unlimber for a little unaccustomed dissipation?

Bruguiere's Play in Paris

Last week it was my duty, as a veracious chronicler of the important doings of the town, to tell you that Emil Bruguiere had returned from Paris with a perfectly wonderful toupee which had transformed his personal appearance. This week I have a bit of news of considerably greater importance concerning this same clever gentleman. It is that Bruguiere has written another play which may be produced in Paris. It is now being read by the managers of the Theatre Comique and Bruguiere has the distinction of being the first American whose dramatic effort has received consideration at such distinguished hands. His first play was produced in this city and made a big hit.

Jealousy Over Braganza's Bride

Speaking of Brugiere reminds me that a little story in which he figures prominently has just come to me from Paris. It concerns the demure but gay American heiress of millions who has just attached herself to the noble house of Braganza. You remember of course that her name has been connected with Bruguiere's in the recent marital unpleasantness of that gentleman. When Emil went to Paris to pour his matrimonial infelicities into the sympathetic ear of his mother he found that his brother Louis was extremely devoted to the young lady in question who was soon to be a prince's bride, and everything seemed to show that she was very well pleased with the attentions of the untitled American. But when Louis presented Emil to the charming young lady, she transferred her lively interest to the newly-arrived member of the family and was much in his company during his stay in the French capital. I hear that this has resulted in an estrangement, more or less serious, between the two brothers.

Uncle—I will make you a monthly allowance, but, understand me, I will pay no debts!
Nephew—All right, uncle. Neither will I.

Walter McCreery to Publish

Walter McCreery, that rather eccentric polo player of Burlingame who manages to worry along on the pittance of $50,000 a year allowed him from the paternal exchequer, and whose domestic concerns are being exploited at length in the newspapers, is back in town. That in itself is not remarkable, for McCreery's comings and goings are sudden and unexpected. But this time McCreery arrived in town with a clearly defined determination to embellish literature with a book. McCreery's last visit to England was replete with various adventures; it enabled him to view social conditions in the tight little isle from many points of vantage, some of them startling. It will be remembered that McCreery's eccentricities became so intensified during his stay in London that it was deemed prudent to curtail his liberty for a while. Now that he is back in town, McCreery says nothing about that great polo project which took him across the water, but he is big with his forthcoming book and is daily edifying his friends with some of the details which will be put into its pages. McCreery declares that he will review English society from the king to the stable-boy, to use his own sweeping phrase. He says that he will pay his devoirs to Whitelaw Reid, our ambassador at St. James, for whom McCreery expresses anything but admiration. Also he hints darkly that he will have a number of things to say about San Francisco society which will be introduced quite naturally when comparison is instituted between the exclusives of London and this city. While I am far from being an enemy of Walter McCreery I must confess that I am anxious to have him write this book.

Mrs. "Bob" Montgomery's Kindness

Those who foregather at one of our big hostelries are talking about the admirable kindness which Mrs. "Bob" Montgomery showed for a bellboy in trouble and I think that it is a very pretty story. Mrs. Montgomery is the wife of "Bob" Montgomery who made a fortune out of the Montgomery Shoshone Mine before he sold it to Charley Schwab. She is a very pretty woman of the buxom type, not as polished perhaps as she might be if so much of her life had not been spent in mining camps, but with a heart of gold. Recently a little tyke of a bellboy in the hotel at which Mrs. Montgomery is staying, was stricken with appendicitis. He had no money and nobody to look after him, so Mrs. Montgomery sent him to a hospital and had the necessary operation performed. It cost her $1000 to save the youngster's life. Of course the little chap was profuse in his thanks when he left the hospital. "When I grow up and earn a good salary, Mrs. Montgomery," he said, "I am going to pay you back all that money." "My boy," answered our lady bountiful, "when you have grown up I will be a very old woman. Maybe I shall be ugly and toothless and in want. If I am, I want you to help me and I know you will because you're a good boy and are going to be a good man."

George Moore to Visit America

From an American friend of that great master of monotone, George Moore, I learn that he has at last turned his thoughts toward this continent. This is not surprising, despite the cruel things which Moore has chosen to utter about the citizens and culture of the United States. This country does not yield to England in recognition and appreciation of the great literary artists. It will be remembered that Meredith acknowledged his debt to our discrimination of taste; and George Moore also has always had a reading public here that was far more acquiescent in his eccentricities than the reading public of Great Britain. Besides I know of no British writer who is altogether detached from the thrall of financial considerations and Moore expects to turn a pretty penny during his visit with us. Moore has written an essay on "Balzac and Shakespeare, a Comparative Study," which he will deliver in Paris and with which he is immensely pleased. "If I can read the lecture as well as I have written it," he says, "I think the audience will be pleased." "My American friends," he says in the same letter, "have been pressing me for a long time to go to America, and perhaps I shall go there next October with this lecture. New York, Philadelphia, Boston and Washington, that's all." I hope that the author of "Evelyn Innes" will allow himself to be lured as far as San Francisco, for I should like very much to see and hear him. I have heard very contradictoory stories about his personality and personal appearance, some representing him as the embodiment of charm, others as quite repellant. One charming literary woman has told me that she cannot understand how the stories of amorous conquest which Moore has retailed in the "Memoirs of My Dead Life" can possibly be true, as the author is so unattractive that it is difficult to believe that any but the most jaded women would feel a romantic interest in him. But let it not be supposed that I am actuated merely by vulgar curiosity in my desire to look upon Moore. Curious I am, but above and beyond my curiosity is a sincere admiration for one of the greatest stylists Great Britain has produced.

A Master of Two Languages

I forgot to mention that when Moore gives his lecture on Balzac and Shakespeare in Paris, he will deliver it in French. Moore is a master of the French of Paris, having done his first poetical and fictional work in that medium. Readers of the "Confessions of a Young Man" will remember that when Moore deserted London for Paris he became so Gallicized that he forgot his mother-tongue and had to learn it all over again when he returned. Naturally it is no extraordinary feat for Moore to lecture in French. I do not think the English-speaking world has produced many bi-lingual authors. Oscar Wilde wrote "Salome" in French but he did not translate it himself. Lord Alfred Douglas made the English version. A greater achievement was that of William Beckford, author of that remarkable oriental romance, "Vathek" which has endured principally on account of the tremendous description of the hall of Eblis. Beckford wrote "Vathek" in French and then translated it into English. Both versions are masterpieces of polished writing. Of course any number of writers might be mentioned who have composed in English and Latin, beginning with Francis Bacon and extending down to our own day, but there is a scarcity of authors who have used two living languages. George Sylvester Viereck, the temperamental young poet of the modern Nineveh, is as happy in German as in English and has published poems which are read in Berlin as well as in New York.

The Great American Novel in the Balance

It grieves me to have to record that a trifling and rather selfish consideration is all that stands in the way of the production of the great American novel. John Fleming Wilson, one of our prolific knights-errant of the pen, who is at present in Washington, has formulated plans for this long-heralded and eagerly awaited book, but is deterred from beginning his "masterpiece in posse" by a terrible thought which he expounds in a letter to Herman Whitaker, as follows: "By the way, I am debating writing the Great American Novel—a nice modest statement of fact. I see by the papers that nobody has done it yet. I've laid out the first five volumes which are entitled as follows: Volume I, Sven Svensen: The Swede; Volume II, Michael O'Connor; Irish-American; Volume III, Friedrich J. von Willomowitz-Ollendorff: of Milwaukee; Volume IV, Gugliemo Pazzini: of San Francisco; Volume V, James Young: British-American. You can see that making each of these a separate story, beginning with the birth, environment, etc., of each hero, describing his character and why he quit his native land for America and then telling how he succeeded in the states, I shall pretty well cover the whole possible field of the Great American Novel. It occurs to me, though, that to write the G. A. N. in fitting style I should have to spend some time in Sweden, Ireland, Germany, Italy and England. This puts a new light on it. I refuse to live in Sweden for art's sake. And the climate of Minnesota is too harsh. Another goddess refuses to emerge from the marble block and be a statue."

Rostand and An American Woman

What is there in the air of Paris that drives Americans who are common-sensible at home into all sorts of assinine actions? It must be that the atmosphere of the capital of the world, like some of its best wines, is too heady for our natives who sojourn there for any length of time; they become inoculated with a species of madness which sometimes takes the form of hero-worship, sometimes of foolishness of a less pardonable kind. At any rate they do things which they would blush to see

New Books in a New Store

READERS of TOWN TALK are preseumed to read the Argonaut. If they don't they should. I was so sure that both papers appeal to the same intelligent class that I divided the details of my Opening Announcement between the Argonaut and Town Talk. Read both to get full particulars and either ad will be accepted as ten per cent cash payment on each dollar's worth of books purchased this week.

THURSDAY, FRIDAY and SATURDAY are the opening days at the new store. YOU, individually are asked to consider this announcement as a personal invitation. I have worked hard fitting up this store with but one object in view, how best to serve the public. For in as much as success in merchandising depends on the pleasing of individuals no trouble, time or expense will be spared in executing orders.

any of their relatives or friends indulging in at home. Here is an instance that has come to me from a Parisian correspondent who vouches for it. An American woman who is pretty well known outside of her own parish, while staying in Paris lately, was seized with a feverish adoration of the genius of Edmond Rostand and determined that she could not be happy unless she obtained his autograph. Now Rostand keeps kingly state; he grants audience with all the flourish of royalty and pays a chamberlain to deal with persistent bores. He has an army of secretaries and attendants to defend his barriers against the outside world. But this American woman eluded every sentinel and rushing into Rostand's dining-room, no less, flung herself at his knees and kissed his hand. After gasping out incoherent expressions of worship and pleadings for forgiveness, she spoke thus: "Let the master forgive a humble worshiper's audacity and make her the happiest of women to the end of her days." That was rather a remarkable speech and might be variously interpreted; but the good lady hastened to explain that all she wanted was an autograph. At this moment a chamberlain rushed forward to tear the intruder from the knees of the god, but the playwright waved him away. "Touch her not," he cried in a voice worthy his own Cyrano; "is she not a woman?" It was undeniable; so the body-guard retreated. The dramatist then made her "the happiest of women to the end of her days" by scribbling his autograph.

Bernhardt Writing a Play

I hear that the divine Sarah is engaged in writing a play; the announcement, as a matter of fact, comes direct from her darling son Maurice. While everybody thought that she was taking her usual vacation in her Brittany sea-girt Castle of Belle Isle where she wears such queer costumes (when the protographer is around), she was in reality driving a dramaturgic pen; thus furnishing another instance of that unquenchable energy which the theatre has never been able to monopolize or exhaust. The piece is to be in four acts and will be brought out at the Theatre des Arts. What it is about and what its name are secrets which have not yet been divulged, for the press agent is working up the public curiosity with the sagacity which Sarah has always commanded at the hands of that functionary. This is not the Bernhardt's first experiment with play-writing. It will be remembered that she did not consider Scribe's version of "Adrienne Lecouvreur" suited to her needs and prepared one of her own in which she appeared in London.

Buffalo Admires Our Honesty

In a letter from a friend who stopped at Buffalo on his way to New York there comes to me a very pretty compliment for San Francisco and as it is based on a circumstance which, I imagine, is unknown to most of my readers, I shall narrate it. While buying a ticket for Niagara my friend was thrown by a common accident of travel into casual conversation with a fine looking man whom he afterwards found to be James F. Doherty, a capitalist of Buffalo, and let it be known that he was from San Francisco. "If you are from San Francisco," said the Buffalo man, "I want to know you. Your people out there must be the most honorable people on earth and a splendid lot. You know we have a very strong organization here called the Knights of Columbus and when you had your big disaster we wanted to help you, so we sent you $1000. You acknowledged the receipt of the money with thanks and we heard no more about it until a year afterwards when we received a check from you for $940. Now what do you think of that? We here in Buffalo don't think another city in the union would have done such a thing. We are trying to figure out what to do with the money and I believe we will deposit it in some bank subject to the call of another earthquake."

The Alcott Home

Some recent visitor to Concord discovered a "for-sale" sign on the dilapidated "Orchard House," once the home of Louise M. Alcott, and now comes an appeal for children's dimes to preserve the memorial. The Alcotts lived in a good many houses, and doubtless they are all more or less dilapidated by this time. Louise Alcott, as some one once remarked, was her father's best contribution to literature. The era of pink teas and ladies' culturine clubs had not dawned then, and had it not been for the successful efforts of the one daughter no one would have known of the existence of the celebrated A. Bronson himself, who spent his time in wandering about the country giving platitudinous "talks" and rhapsodic lectures which netted not even traveling expenses. Rebecca Harding Davis has had the courage to give it as her view that Alcott would have been far better occupied in turning his small skill at carpentry to advantage in earning money for his family; and Julian Hawthorne has intimated that paterfamilias was an old bore. The older generation of readers of "Little Women" have also read what was left of the most judiciously edited diary and letters of Louise Alcott, and if any memorial habitation of hers is to be preserved they would choose the room she was obliged to rent in Boston in order that she could command leisure and isolation to write the books which furnished the subsistence for the rest of the family. Louise Alcott was old before her time. She was virtually father and mother to her sisters and son and daughter to her parents. She had no time for travel or rest when she was young enough to enjoy or profit by them, and when the means, her own earnings, were available, she was too tired to care. She was the "willing horse," and met the usual fate, but if it is essential that an old house be preserved simply because for a brief while she lived under its roof, her nephews and niece, who profited by her work, should be able and willing to attend to it. The best memorial and monument—the one that she herself would value highest, is the continued popularity of her wholesome books for girls which have had, as yet, few equals and no superiors.

Rosa Benko, "The Star of the East"

A brief dispatch hidden away in a corner of a local paper called attention the other day to the attempted suicide of Rosa Benko in Vienna. I wonder how many people remembered Rosa Benko when they read that little item? The career of such a woman as she is usually as shortlived as it is dazzling and by the time that death comes to cap the climax of wrinkles, old age and disease, nearly everybody has forgotten. It is this way, no doubt, with Rosa Benko, known as "The Star of the East" and "the most beautiful woman in Europe" not so many years ago. In her youth Rosa Benko was a strikingly beautiful brunette, tall for a woman and with a superb figure. Though she lacked education, she had learned to assume an aristocratic bearing and had great charm of manner. She was a chorus girl in the music halls of the European capitals when she attracted the admiration of Milan, then King of Servia, the worst spendthrift and one of the greatest roues in all Europe. The King was devoted to her for perhaps a week longer than he ever was to another woman. She transferred her affections to Milan's son, young King Alexander of Servia. He gave her an apartment in the royal palace at Belgrade, exquisite gowns and costly gems. The chorus girl of the music halls was introduced in court circles as the niece of the King's physician and a gentlewoman of birth. She adapted herself quickly to her new surroundings; a court that had endured King Milan was not to be shocked by an incident like this. Milan often invited whole burlesque and comic opera companies to the palace and entertained them for days. Natalie, King Alexander's mother, knew Rosa Benko's antecedents, but the former Queen merely remarked: "Doubtless my son will marry before long, so he should learn how to make love." Immediately after his marriage, Rosa Benko was compelled to leave Belgrade and went to Vienna, where she met the Prince of Bulgaria, who fell madly in love with her. But her efforts to wear a crown were frustrated. And now, in a sordid lodging she has tried to end her life.

NINO AT THE OPERA

Nino was young, twenty, and he loved. He was an Italian and he loved music. Before he died he was a master. He studied at a school twenty-five miles from Milan. His dreams in youth were not of fame, but of success in art. He did not care to hear applause—he longed rather to hear distinctly the great harmonies, which came as yet to him reluctantly in a half way, that he might give them a re-creation.

One day in spring he was told that a famous prima donna was to sing in "Sonnambula" in Milan. "I must hear that," he said. But how? He was very poor. He tried to borrow from his relations. They were too poor to furnish him more than enough to purchase a ticket and to pay for his lodging in the city. "Very well," said Nino at last, "I have walked twenty-five miles; I can do it again." On the particular day he started early. The morning was cool and radiant. It was on such a morning that Mendelssohn caught the fancy of his spring song. Nino's first five miles were an exhilaration. Then the sunshine intensified, and he paused to rest. Long before Milan was reached his limbs ached, his throat was parched, his eyes were smarting with the dust and heat. He reached Milan at dusk, bathed, ate a hasty meal, and went directly to the theatre.

The auditorium was cool and dark; the audience had not arrived. Nino sat in his comfortable chair with a double happiness, the sweet passive sense of rest and the thrilling, active sense of anticipation. He noticed a piece of gilt moulding on which the glint was visible from a light behind the stage. A man was walking regularly somewhere in the foyer—thrump, thump, thrump, thrump. Nino leaned back his head and stretched out his legs.

It was an usher who tapped Nino on the shoulder.

"Come!" said the usher, "you'll have to get out."

Nino looked up sleepily. "I have a ticket for this seat."

"Yes, but the opera was over fifteen minutes ago."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy.

Stocks: There has been very little change in the range of values in the recent week, fluctuations in leading securities being the result of inside support on moderate declines and sales on strong spots by the same interests. It would appear as if bankers were well satisfied with the commercial outlook and that the money situation abroad would clear up later without further tension, or raising of the bank rates in Germany or England. As for the monetary situation here, conditions are not particularly unfavorable, though we might say that a temporary condition prevails here that might create some uneasiness and this is the matter of taking over some heavy foreign loans on American securities estimated as high as fifty million dollars. Bankers have unquestionably taken care of the placing of these loans here, and the incident should be but a temporary factor, both as concerns our bank figures and the security market. Probably the most important matter in the business world is the tremendous impetus in the steel industry and the placing of large orders for supplies and equipment by leading railway companies, the effect of which will be farreaching in general industry throughout the country. The sentiment of Wall street interests is much diversified in the security market at the moment as to what effect the assembling of Congress at Washington on December 5 will have. In some quarters there is unrest, caused by fear that the Taft administration may resume legislation of an unfavorable kind against corporate interests. We feel disposed to be very conservative in our views on this important matter, and can only advise caution in overcommitting in a period of such political uncertainty.

Grain: Weight of receipts has worked a stiff decline in the wheat market, and with the falling in the futures, there has been a corresponding drop in cash premiums, though the latter are still above the market. Spring wheat is 2¼ cents over and hard winter 1½. The Nebraska shipments have broken the premium on hard wheat more sharply than the futures. So far there has been no let up in the receipts, and they are running well above a year ago. By Monday or Tuesday the attitude of the farmer to the price decline will be revealed in the receipts and if there is a drop below last year's volume, the market will be checked and a moderate rally follow. The decline has brought us within one and a half cents of an export basis with Europe. The exports this week were over five million bushels, principally Pacific Coast grain and flour from both coasts. The visible increase in the week will be small despite the large receipts and will give added help to a rise, should the receipts fall off. Being now so close to the export position we are again subject to world influences, and these influences are now moderately bullish, but solely on the present supply basis. Europe's stock is only moderate and a decline in Russian shipments will now set in with no important supply basis, outside Canada and this country, until February when Argentina wheat will be arriving in Europe. The bear side is less promising though an advance will not be large from present outlook.

Corn traders are waiting for the government report on Monday. The private estimates have all raised over the October figures of 2,585,000,000, which is natural, considering that estimates are made on a 32 bushel basis, which recent years has shown to be too small. If the average yield per acre is proportionately as large as last November, the government is liable to show 2,700,000,000 bushels. This approximates last year's crop. The farm supplies of over 100,000,000 will make the report moderately bearish. While the long view favors last year's prices, the crop report may break the market. Receipts will not be as heavy as a year ago, as the crop in the big states is too moist for shipment and the weather for two weeks has been unfavorable for curing. I would rather buy on the break if the government is around 2,700,000,000 than sell for heavy decline.

Cotton: Events of the week find no parallel short of the season of 1903-04 and on the exchanges of the country the memorable campaign of that year has been often recalled. The advance of 85 to 88 points which occurred last week was all wiped out by the enormous profit-taking liquidation indulged in by leading bulls on Thursday, Friday and Saturday. The net advance in options since September 1, however, is still slightly in excess of 200 points or 2 cents per point and quoted prices on spots are about 2 3-16 cents higher. In order that conditions this year may be compared with conditions prevailing in 1903-04 we submit the following statistical facts as outlined by Mr. Frank B. Hayne of New Orleans: "In 1903-04, known as the 'Sully year," the crop was 10,011,000 bales and the consumption only 10,083,000 bales. Last year the consumption had increased 3,074,000 bales or 30.49 per cent. The visible supply on the first of September, this season, was 1,472,000 and on the first of September, 1903, was 517,000 bales or only 955,000 bales less. Therefore, in the 'Sully year,' with a visible supply on September 1 of 517,000 bales and a crop of 10,011,000 bales, the world had 10,528,000 bales of cotton, of which they used 10,083,000 bales. The visible supply on the first of September, this year, was 1,472,000 bales. If the crop should only prove 10,500,000 bales and there is a possibility of its not reaching 10,000,000 bales, the world will have a supply of only 11,972,000 bales, while last year it actually consumed, in spite of short time in England, 13,157,000 bales or a deficit of 1,185,000 bales. Why, if in the 'Sully year' the crop had only been 7,500,000 bales to 8,000,000 bales, the situation would not be as acute as it will be if this crop only turns out 10,500,000 bales; yet in that year cotton sold for over 18 cents per pound. If every American mill were to run half time from now until the end of the season, I do not consider there would be enough cotton to go around. The spinners' takings to October 29, this year, were 1,923,000 bales against only 1,801,000 bales at the same time last year (which had been the record takings of any year up to that time) and against 1,148,000 bales the same time in 1903-04." Who can tell what price will discount the above facts?

or so have been very active and have rewarded their followers with several substantial advances. The real feature of the recent trade has been the sensational rise in Associated Oil. This stock has been taken in hand and in a very short time has been advanced over ten points. The flood of buying orders on it has been caused, it is said, by the excellent financial and physical condition that the company is rapidly getting into. Among authoritative circles there has not been even the faintest rumor of a dividend on Associated Oil and it is not likely that the company will pay one for some time. Pacific Gas and Electric stocks seem to be on the verge of a reawakening as New York is commencing to renew her bids for them. Pacific Telephone common has made little change of late but where a change has been made, it was for lower levels. Telephone preferred holds up splendidly and is well worth the money. Hawaiian Sugar shares have come once again into popularity and continual advances have been made in the whole group. The high price of raw sugar in New York together with the improving conditions at the plantations are responsible for the upward move. Alaska Packers stock is fastly making good the extremely bullish predictions on it and it is still said to be at a point where good profits can be made in it. Those of the power stocks that are listed have lately made some good gains, especially Northern California Power and Pacific Lighting common. Giant Powder has had some excellent but quiet buying and has risen several points. Fireman's Fund Insurance continues to break records and those of the policy holders of this company who have seen fit to hang on to their stock, are congratulating themselves. Spring Valley Water has had some strong support recently and a number of people are predicting higher prices shortly for it. The local bond market has been rather dull without much change. The chief interest seems to be centered in United Railroads 4s, Spring Valley Water 4s, Southern Pacific refunding 4s, "Key Route" first 5s, Telephone 5s, People's Water 5s and California Gas and Electric corporation 5s. There does not seem to be anything that the near future can bring forth that can have anything but a healthy effect on the leading California stocks and bonds and it certainly looks as if the general list should continue toward higher marks. It is said that purchases of Pacific Gas and Electric common, Alaska Packers and Giant Powder, at their present quotations, are the most advisable.

The Week's Engagement Rumors

Three very charming young ladies have been the subject of engagement gossip during the past week—Miss Marian Newhall, Miss Harriet Alexander and Miss Dorothy Boericke. All of Miss Newhall's friends are wondering and speculating about the deep devotion and marked attention displayed for her by a stalwart and handsome young man to whose identity I will give only one clue, and that is, that his looks altogether belie his name. A few days ago Miss Newhall was lunching at a fashionable cafe with some of her friends who were acutely aware all the time that this young chap's eyes, constantly trained upon the attractive young lady, made open confession of his enthralment. Miss Harriet Alexander, the fascinating daughter of one of our social arbiters, wears her romance, not upon her sleeve, but in her corsage in the form of what is coming to be regarded as the sign positive of an engagement—orchids. As Melville Bowman has been exhibiting symptoms of a romantic attachment to this young lady, everybody is wondering whether the rare blossoms are his gift. As for Miss Dorothy Boericke, it is considered quite likely that she will soon follow in the footsteps of her twin sister Ruth by announcing her engagement to a very popular chap who holds a responsible position in the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank and whose sister wields one of the cleverest pens in this city.

Miss Ethel Lincoln to Wed

A wedding which will take place within a few days and which will come as a genuine surprise to the ultra smart set, is that of Miss Ethel Lincoln, daughter of the late Jerome Lincoln, and J. Ralston Hamilton, son of the late Alexander Hamilton. The couple will leave immediately for New York to sail in the middle of November for a six months' tour abroad. Jerome Lincoln was a capitalist and one of the early directors of the Bank of California. The beautiful Lincoln home was a land mark of Harrison street near First before the fire. Miss Ethel Lincoln is a traveled and cultured young woman and her beautiful home, Ethelwilde, St. Helena, is one of the most attractive in that part of the country. Ralston Hamilton is an architect. His family are prominent here, his sisters Misses Edna Laura and the beautiful Alexandra Hamilton being very prominent socially.

Sidney Starr and a Grass Widow

Up at the Family Club and in other of his favorite haunts, friends of Sidney Starr, the well-known youth-about-town, are wondering whether he is about to take a second plunge into matrimony. The gossip started when friends of the popular flaneur went down to the steamer recently to see him off to Honolulu; for they found that a very beautiful divorcee of Oakland was also making the trip and as Starr has been quite attentive to her, it is regarded as quite likely that he is about to essay the path to connubial bliss once more. Starr's intimates are wondering whether the fact that he took permanent quarters in the new home of the Stork had the unusual effect of turning his thoughts away from the Family coterie to the contemplation of the joys of real domesticity and they are awaiting his return rather eagerly and even laying small wagers on the outcome. Starr's own divorce was the sensation of San Rafael a year ago.

Miss Ruth Richards, Debutante

There hasn't been a debutante of the flawless beauty of Ruth Richards since the days when Mrs. Vincent Whitney and Mrs. Andrew Welch reigned as belles, making existence a gladsome misery for half a dozen chaps.

Of course there are other debutantes, some pretty, others sweet dainty girls, but it is my prophecy that the lissome stately Miss Ruth is going to be a queen. She is tall, "Englishy" looking, with a manner of sweet reserve. No wonder her grandparents and relatives, the H. H. Bancrofts, the Paul Bancrofts, the Phil Bancrofts and all the rest, are so proud of her. I am glad to say that she doesn't seem the least bit spoiled or conscious of her beauty. At the ball on Wednesday she wore a dress that looked like a mass of cloudy lace glimmering with dewdrops. It was a long princess robe of white silk and chiffon, made with an overdress of net covered with tiny crystals, the lacy net being perfectly plain in outline, very full about the bottom and fitting with slimpsy ease about the waist. She looked the little aristocrat to perfection. Mrs. C. Olcott Richards, her mother, who is a handsome vivacious woman, wore a gown of soft white satin, much embroidered with gold. Stately Mrs. H. H. Bancroft fulfilled one's ideal of the dowager society matron, wearing a black Chantilly gown over mauve satin. The lace was woven in one piece and was a rare bit of artistic needlework. The Bancroft house was built by the Henry Huntingtons during the days of their social regnancy. Since the divorce Mrs. Huntington has not cared for the big place and lately it was acquired by the Bancrofts. It is well suited to entertainment on an elaborate scale. The ball room which is on the ground floor, was all in greens and Christmas berries, while the rest of the house was decorated in flowers without end. Off the ballroom was a temporary conservatory, a large tent that was decorated with rugs, palms, trees and flowers until one could easily believe one's self to be in some fairy garden. Everybody who wasn't at the Gibson-Foster wedding at San Rafael was at the ball, and a few went to both. Over three hundred invitations had been issued.

Mrs. Deering, a Beautiful Suffragette

Of all the matrons at the Bancroft ball one of the most admired was Mrs. Frank Deering whose regal height was enveloped in a graceful Princess gown of gold tissue, the whole covered with an overdress of some pretty black silk net embroidered in gold in a conventional design. Fancy the effect of such a creation on a tall stately woman with black hair, a sparkling smile and the cleverest, wittiest manner imaginable! A friend of mine remarked that if the suffrage-militants would follow Mrs. Deering's tactics the men would rush to do their bidding. Like many clever women elsewhere, Mrs. Deering has recently joined the suffragists and should the much-talked-of Mrs. Pankhurst come to San Francisco a-crusading, doubtless Mrs. Deering will entertain her. "Women like Mrs. Deering do not need the ballot. They are more than a match for us without it," said one man. Which is probably correct. Still Mrs. Deering. like Mrs. William H. Crocker and a few of that set, are staunch believers in equal suffrage. Mrs. Calhoun, another of that coterie, being imbued with the ideas prevailing in the south, is not outspoken about suffrage, but there are any number of women like Mrs. Deering and Mrs. Crocker whose braininess, charm, wit and position, once allied to that cause, make the old-timers rejoice, even if they do not adopt the clever ways of the new converts. The fact is, the old-time suffragists resent the intrusion of these clever society dames. The split in New York is sufficient evidence of this.

Back From Europe

Mr. and Mrs. Garret W. McEnerney have returned from Europe where they spent four months in leisurely travel. They sojourned for a time at Nauheim where Mr. McEnerney recuperated the energies that were taxed by the incessant demands on his professional services, and he has returned in perfect health. The McEnerneys enjoyed every moment of their time abroad, but with them getting back home is one of the chief delights of a trip to foreign parts.

Hyperbole About the De Sabla Ball

I have been wondering a good deal about the motive which induced a morning paper to devote two prominent columns to the most extravagant sort of nonsense about the De Sabla ball which took place last night at El Cerrito. It is too bad that people who have a gift for hospitality and entertainment should be made ridiculous by such unwarranted hyperboles. To read the newspaper description one would suppose that the ball in honor of Miss Vera De Sabla's coming-out was a riot of vulgar luxury whereas it was nothing of the kind. To say that it cost thousands of dollars is preposterous and the term "orchid ball," so plentifully strewn through the article in question, was a misnomer, for orchids did not enter into the decorative scheme. The simple fact is that the De Sablas invited their friends to a dance at their beautiful place and finding that the accommodations would be insufficient, erected a temporary dancing pavilion. In keeping with the tone of the rest of the article was the statement that Miss De Sabla boasts $50,000 worth of jewelry. Miss De Sabla is a girl of only twenty years and as becomes a girl of that age, has scarcely any jewelry at all. She has no taste for the bizarre and would be the last in the world to desire that her coming-out party should be made an ostentatious parade of wealth.

Will They Be Reconciled?

The most contradictory stories continue to be told about Emil Bruguiere and his vivacious wife who has commenced action for divorce. Some of these tales depict them as being divided beyond all hope of reconciliation while others paint the glowing possibility of forgiveness and renewed happiness. There seems to be plenty of room for argument, for undoubtedly the relations of the pair are of the most puzzling character. Last Saturday they were seen walking along Kearny street with their young son between them. Emil was deferentially attentive to his young wife and exhibited the warmest paternal fondness and care for his boy. Naturally it is rumored that the rift in the lute has been mended and that the divorce suit will be withdrawn to make way for complete domestic harmony. Let us hope that such is the case.

The Jester Comes Back to Life

It is the theory of some learned historians that the court jester disappeared when monarchs and others had sufficiently cultivated their brains to acquire a sense of humor of their own. That speaks well for the kings and nobles, of course; but I am afraid that the theory will prove disconcerting to some of our gilted families that pride themselves on being au courant with the latest foibles of fashion. For the fact is that the jester has been awakened from his sleep of centuries and is even now contorting his motley limbs, rattling his bauble and wagging his inconsequential tongue in the drawing rooms of London and the "cottages" of Newport. In London, where the innovation appeared recently, one of those unhappy ladies whom the English with a genius for disagreeable phrases call "a decayed gentlewoman," conducts a bureau which purveys jesters of all conditions for all sorts of fashionable occasions. When the London fashion reached New York and Newport, as it did by the first steamer, it is said that Henry Lehr took to his bed with nervous prostration and raved that his occupation was gone. However, it is reported from reliable authority that he has plucked up heart of grace, recollecting that he has so many years of clowning in polite society to his credit that nobody but a positive genius could overtake him. That the role of a fashionable jester is not yet a profitable field for genius is indicated by the latest salary quotation from Newport. A jester commands $60 a week provided he possess "nimble wit, an unfailing flow of humor, gentlemanly appearance and manners and a kindly disposition." Clearly these qualifications need not disturb Harry Lehr, especially as his jesting has stood him in much better stead than $60 a week.

Who Will Our Jesters Be?

As we of San Francisco pride ourselves on keeping pace with London and Newport, it behooves us to bethink ourselves seriously of this jesting business. We must have our licensed jesters straightaway—I mean, of course, the new variety of licensed jesters; for we have had some of a different sort for lo these many years. The great question is: Who will fill the bill? 'Tis a difficult question to answer offhand. If Addison Mizner were in our midst I would name him to head the list, but Addie has long since hied him to the metropolitan playground and instead of dispensing his verbal largess at dinners and balls, hoards it carefully for a twelvemonth and then brings it out at the merry Yuletide in a fashionable almanac called the "Cynic's Calendar." So Addie is out of the question. I don't know whether Larry Harris would like the post or not; but he has some of the qualifications. So, for that matter, have several other members of the Family Club which is peculiarly rich in village cut-ups. I do not wish to seem invidious in picking eligible jesters from the motley throng of local society in its various strata; so if those whose mouths water for the playful work will kindly send me their pasteboards, I will arrange a list with careful regard for comparative excellence and will publish it with suitable annotations. Then hostesses who wish to possess the latest appendage of fashionable frivolity will have an infallible guide for which, not being a "decayed gentleman or gentlewoman" I shall charge no commission.

They Get Their Jewels "On Approval"

As this is the time of year when the thoughts of our leisured men and women turn to dances and other social diversions, it may prove interesting if I epitomize a conversation I had recently with a well-known member of our biggest jewelry firm. Certainly it slants a curious light upon the amazing expedients to which some of our "best families" resort in order to hold their own in the winter campaign. This gentleman told me that invariably, on the eve of a Greenway ball or of some other brilliant function, at least half a dozen customers leave orders with his firm for diamond aigrettes, jewel-encrusted brooches and other expensive ornaments which they ask to have sent to their homes "on memorandum" or "approval," as this trade transaction is called. And just as invariably, he tells me, these brilliants are worn at the ensuing ball or reception or dinner and are returned to the big shop on the following day with the message that they are not satisfactory and will not be purchased. He told me that the people who do this are financially responsible, as a rule, and such good customers that their transparent tricks must be put up with. The liability which his firm assumes in this manner on the occasion of a Greenway ball, he says, is never less than $10,000 or $15,000. Once, he said, a family which was giving an elaborate dinner sent for two silver dinner services "on approval" and when the costly pieces were returned the morning after the affair, there were unmistakable signs that they had been used. This state of things is not peculiar to San Francisco; Tiffany has to cope with exactly the same situation.

To Be Heard at the Greek Theatre

Three clever ambitious girls whose musical talents have been flatteringly commented upon, plan to give a concert at the Greek Theatre on Sunday. One of them, Miss Katherine Gray of San Rafael, has been studying the piano in Berlin and her appearance at several of the smart clubs has justified the fine things her friends say of her playing. Miss Ida von Weick, a young singer whose voice and interpretation of the art of singing have been highly praised, will vary the recital by a group of songs. Miss Rena Burnham, a University of California girl who has devoted many years to the mastery of the piano, is also to be heard.

Exhibition of Russian Handicraft

Great interest attaches to the exhibition of Russian handicraft which will be given at 208 Griffith avenue, San Mateo, by Mrs. Florence Delanoy Eichwaldt on November 15, 16 and 17. Included in the display will be laces, enamel, lacquer work, carved horn, hammered copper and brass, Circassian gold and silver work, carvings and pottery with other examples of artistry which should delight the souls of the connoiseurs. Mrs. Eichwald is a well known collector whose activities have brought her to the notice of the Queen of Roumania, herself an enthusiast in arts and crafts. She has lived in Russia, was a Red Cross worker during the Russo-Japanese war and spent much time at the Winter Palace of Esthonia in 1903 and 1904. In this country she is known as a lecturer and writer as well as a collector.

Miss Montagne's Recital

The piano recital given by Miss Edna Montagne, a pupil of Mrs. Oscar Mansfeldt, attracted a large and fashionable audience to Century Hall on Tuesday evening. The young pianiste acquitted herself most creditably and won numerous recalls from the enthusiastic music-lovers present. She gave evidence of talent of a high order and of most careful training. Barring a slight nervousness in the first part of the program Miss Montagne gave an excellent interpretation of the various numbers, showing clearness of execution and faultless pedalling. It was a delightful musical treat. The program included Beethoven's Sonate, Opus 22 and numbers from Schumann, Chopin, Liszt, Paderewski, Wagner-Brassin and Donizetti.

In the Social Spotlight

The wedding of Miss Edith Page and James Van Loben Sels has been set for the evening of December 8 at the residence of Mrs. Wilfred Page in Berkeley.

Mrs. James de Fremery entertained at dinner last Wednesday evening in honor of Miss Elinor Slate, Miss Edith Page and Miss Mariana Mathews, the trio of beautiful young girls who are soon to become brides of the Van Loben Sels brothers.

A new dancing club has been formed called "The Neighbors." The meetings take place once a month at the Arts and Crafts Hall in Presido Avenue. Mrs. Postelthuaite, Mrs. Otis Burrage and several other young matrons have the affair in charge.

Capt. W. L. Reed was host at a delightful tea given to the "younger set" of officers and their wives, and their friends outside the Post, at Pebble Beach Lodge on Saturday. Among those present were Major and Mrs. W. M. Wright, Mrs. W. K. Wright, Mrs. Merriam, Lieut. and Mrs. Kilde, Capt. and Mrs. Dolf, Lieut. and Mrs. Jones, Mrs. Patty Johnson, Miss Pickering, Miss Fore, Miss Ames, Miss Gregg, Miss Warner, Miss Bennett, Miss Cornish, Mrs. Warner, Captain Pickering, Dr. Wright, Lieutenant Baker, Lieutenant James, Lieutenant Fletcher, Lieutenant Oldsmith, Dr. Mason, Lieutenant Eppley and Mr. Evert.

Mrs. Cunningham of Berkeley, with Mrs. James B. Weed of New York, have been spending the week at Del Monte.

Mr. E. M. Langley went to Del Monte for a few days during the week past.

Truxton Beale who has been in the city for a week staying at the Fairmont has returned to his home in Bakersfield.

Mrs. H. N. Beall has an attractive apartment at the Hotel Victoria and will remain in town for the entire season.

Dr. R. F. Buckley and his two daughters, Miss Grace and Miss Violet Buckley, have taken permanent apartments at the Fairmont for the coming season.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Lilienthal spent several days of their honeymoon at Del Monte.

Capt. A. L. Reed entertained Lieut. A. Johnson and Dr. R. M. Riggall of H. M. S. Bedford at a luncheon, given at Hotel del Monte recently.

In the building of a new home so many problems confront one, that it is a relief to be able to determine one's lighting fixture requirements under such favorable circumstances as is possible at the new downtown studios of The Enos Company.

Instead of being lead through a maze of glitter and glass by a more or less incompetent salesman, you are taken into a small room, where nothing is on display except the fixtures being suggested for your home. This selection is only made after careful consideration of the requirements of your residence, not only from the architectural and decorative treatment of the surroundings, but with a view of reflecting as far as is possible the personality of the occupant.

The result thus obtained means a degree of harmony between the lighting fixtures and the rest of the decorations, which produces that feeling of rest and peacefulness which is the ideal condition in the truly artistic interior.

Laughing with Victor Morley

By Edward F. O'Day

By close attention to the opening dialogue I learned that the Victim of Dyspepsia had come down to the hotel at Sea View for a Rest. I gleaned also that the Victim of Dyspepsia had a Ward and that the Ward was in Love; likewise that the Victim of Dyspepsia had a Son and that the Son was Desperately and Obstinately in Love. The cumulative force of these discoveries was too much for me and my heart went out in genuine sorrow to the Victim of Dyspepsia. Some slight experience with musical comedy convinced me that there would be no Rest for the Victim of Dyspepsia. The event proved me something of a Sherlock Holmes for there was absolutely no Rest for the Victim of Dyspepsia; he might have been one of the wicked for all the Rest he enjoyed during the two acts of "The Three Twins." As I say, I could not help feeling genuinely sorry for the Victim of Dyspepsia, but to my shame be it spoken, I showed my sorrow in most equivocal fashion. With seeming lack of conscience I laughed at him and with his Son. Yes, I must confess that I laughed. Almost from his Son's first entrance I began to giggle foolishly; then I tittered; gurgled after that; and before long I admit that I did "crow like chanticleer." It was positively indecent conduct in the presence of a Victim of Dyspepsia and perhaps the time will come when dyspepsia will wreak itself upon me in punishment for my heartlessness. But if I thought that I could laugh again like that I would revisit "The Three Twins" tonight and defy dyspepsia to come and do its worst. To become an intermittent fountain of laughter for two hours and a half I would gladly defy, not only dyspepsia but his brother-imp insomnia. What is a dyspeptic sleepless week compared to two hours and a half of thoroughly idiotic cachinnation? Now mind you, this physical demonstration of mine was real simon-pure laughter. Let me explain. The other day I happened to be reading the Spectator and ran across this sentence: "That secret elation or pride of heart which is generally called laughter, arises in man from his comparing himself with an object below him, whether it so happens that it be a natural or an artificial fool." Now of course that is all tommyrot; Addison didn't know what real simon-pure laughter was. He never had his facial muscles lubricated with the oil of Victor Morley's comicality. There was no secret elation or pride of heart in me when Victor Morley nudged me in the risibles and sent me off into uncontrollable guffaws. I did not go through any mental process of comparing myself with any natural or artificial fool; my brain was just a blotter saturating itself with globules of mirth and in that teeming atmosphere of delicious foolery I had no thought of natural or artificial fools. I may have acted as though I belonged to both species for aught I know or care. I have heard of Rabelaisian laughter and being of a melancholy humor, have mouth-watered at the phrase; I have meditated with envy on the taking-off of Aretine who died a-laughing; I have yearned for the return of Democritus that I might enroll myself as the pupil of his laughing philosophy; yet do I verily believe that after a few sessions with Victor Morley I could write a treatise on laughter which would make the old anatomist of melancholy hold his sides in convulsions. It may be that I become too exuberant when my disposition takes an antic turn; it is possible that Addison who had little love for Rabelais and less for Aretine and who was anything but a disciple of Democritus, would consider me ill-bred in so chortling my self-possession to smithereens at the beck of Victor Morley. But I care not; let us look, listen and be merry, for tomorrow there may come doleful plays, stupid plays and you and I may be politely hiding our yawns where before we brazenly gave rein to our ha-has. Sufficient for the day is the laughter thereof; yes, sufficient for many days is the recollection of one's night's laughter. 'Tis an exercise in which we are too little indulged. Too often are we compelled to bend the pregnant hinges of the jaw that ennui may follow yawning; let the theatrical managers give us more Victor Morleys so that we may more frequently unlimber our apparatus of mirth and laugh ourselves into health, good humor and adipose. Everything is funny in "The Three Twins." The Victim of Dyspepsia is only one provocative to glee—there are as many provocatives as there are members of the cast—and Victor Morley is the prime provocative of them all. Even the chorus is funny—the legs, that is of course the limbs, of the "broilers" are a scream. I never saw "broilers" before with such chunky limbs; probably they were picked out for their chunkiness in that particular. But this is a subject to which Addison would not stoop and I must not go completely out of his good graces. It is more decorous to speak of Miss Bessie Clifford, although there is nothing particularly decorous about her; she bounds about the stage like a rubber ball until the eye is dazed and the brain is giddied with trying to follow her. Her Yama Yama dance is as much a thing of air as of earth and she seems to tread both elements with equal agility. Her little feet were made to kick and prance, not to be still and it is quite impossible to imagine her in repose. But there is nothing reposeful about "The Three Twins" except some of the pretty musical numbers which are mercifully interspersed in order that a prostracted audience may not laugh itself into hysterics. Come again, Victor Morley, that we may lard ourselves with your fat humor and forget our cares in the spell of your irresponsible nonsense.

Cohan's Music Play is Coming

The song numbers in George M. Cohan's recent musical success, "The Talk of New York," which Cohan and Harris will present with the clever Victor Moore as a star at the Van Ness Theatre, opening Monday night, constitute its chief charm. In fact it is said that in clothing his latest effort with music Cohan has surpassed all his previous efforts. One of the big song features is "Under Any Old Flag At All," rendered by Victor Moore and twenty members of the chorus. Other song hits which have gained widespread popularity in this play are: "Burning Up the Boulevard," "Busy Little Broadway," "I Want You All to Drink With Me," "I Have a Longing for Long Acre Square," "Claremont," "Drink With Me," "I Want the World to Know I Love You," and "Gee: Ain't I Glad I'm Home Again." The magnitude of the production and the number of people required to present this play necessitate special train service.

The Jomelli Concerts

This Sunday afternoon at the Novelty Theatre, Mme. Jomelli, the prima donna soprano and her gifted associate Marie Nichols, violiniste, will give their second concert. The program will be an exceptionally fine one. Mme. Jomelli's offerings will be the Aria from "La Tosca," Pucini; "Chant de Bachante," Bemberg; "Heimliche Aufforderung," Richard Strauss; "The Wind," Spross; "In dem Schatten meiner Locken," Hugo Wolff; "Chanson de Neige," Chaminade; "Neimand hat's geseh'n," Carl Loewe; and "Le Nil" (with violin obligato), the work of Leroux. Miss Nichols will play Wieniawski's "Faust Fantasie"; "Gypsy Dance," Nachez; "Romanze Andalusa," Sarasate; and with the assistance of Fred Maurer, a "Sonata" by Francoeur, a work never before heard in this city and said to be a genuine old masterpiece. The last concert of the series will be given next Thursday night.

EDWIN STEVENS

Who will appear in "A Busy Morning" next week at the Orpheum.

English Comedy at Valencia

The last performances of "Mr. Hamlet of Broadway" will be given at the Valencia this Saturday afternoon and evening and on Sunday night, Dallas Welford, an English comedian, will make his first appearance in San Francisco in "Mr. Hopkinson," a comedy by R. C. Carton. Mr. Welford was brought from London a few seasons ago and made an instantaneous hit at the Liberty Theatre, New York, in the same comedy in which he will appear in this city. For nine months the theatre was crowded to the doors and "Hoppy," as the play and character came to be familiarly known, was the laughing success of the metropolis. The company which has been associated with the star during the long and successful run of "Mr. Hopkinson" in this country, jumps directly from New York. The only matinees will be on Saturday and Thanksgiving.

MARY ADELE CASE

The remarkable young contralto singer who is to appear at the Novelty Theatre.

Figman Role for John Ince

"The Man on the Box," Grace Livingston Furniss' dramatization of Harold McGrath's novel, will be the Alcazar's next offering, commencing Monday evening. This comedy is well and favorably known to San Francisco, having served twice as a starring vehicle for Max Figman. With John Ince, Evelyn Vaughan and all the other favorites in the cast adequate acting is assured and the staging will be up to Alcazar standard. Mr. Ince will have the title part, and Miss Vaughan will be seen as Betty Annesley, the girl with whom the hero is so madly in love that he masquerades as a coachman in order to be near her.

The Dr. Wullner Recitals

Dr. Ludwig Wullner, the lieder singer, is to be heard here. Last year he was promised but his success in the East was so great that in place of forty concerts originally arranged he was compelled to sing over one hundred and had to cancel his western engagement. This year Will Greenbaum has induced him to come to San Francisco. With his accompanist, Coenraad V. Bos, this artist is said to create an atmosphere in the concert room that is most unusual. He makes every song seem like a drama and one does not have to understand German to follow every meaning. The Wullner dates are Tuesday night, November 23, Friday night, November 26, and Sunday afternoon, November 28 at the Novelty Theatre, and the sale of seats will open at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, Wednesday, November 17.

Another Week of "The Three Twins"

The second and last week of "The Three Twins" starts tomorrow night and bids fair to exceed the first week of the engagement in point of enthusiasm and record-breaking attendance. The only matinees are given on the Saturday afternoons, and the engagement will close a week from this Saturday night. "The Three Twins" will be followed at the Garrick by "The Soul Kiss," with Mlle. Pertina in the star part. "The Soul Kiss" is one of last season's conspicuous New York successes, and is said to be quite tuneful and exceptionally attractive.

The Mary Adele Case Concerts

Rarely has there been as much interest displayed in concerts as in the two to be given at the Novelty Theatre by Miss Mary Adele Case, the contralto. At her first concert next Friday night, November 19, Miss Case will be heard in two of the great test pieces for contraltos: "Ah! Mon Fils" from "Le Prophete" and "Ah! se tu dormi" from an almost forgotten setting of "Romeo and Juliet" by Vaccaj. In the way of songs we are promised "Der Tod und das Madchen," Schubert; "Ich Grolle Nicht," Schumann; "Traum durch die Dammerung" Strauss; "Mein Liebe ist Gruen," Braham; "L'Heure de Pourpre," Augusta Holmes; "L'Esclave," Lalo; "Allah," Chadwick; "Gae to Sleep," Fisher; "O, That We Two Were Maying," Nevin; and "Spring Song," Becker. Mr. Frederick Biggerstaff will be the accompanist and will play Chopin's "Fantasie," Op. 49. The second and last Case concert will be given Sunday afternoon, November 21, when another delightful program will be given and by request the artist will sing the beautiful song "Abide With Me" with which she scored most heavily while on tour with Harold Bauer.

Edwin Stevens at the Orpheum

The popular actor, Edwin Stevens, will appear next week at the Orpheum in a comedietta entirely new to us entitled "A Busy Morning," which is said to be a capital vehicle for the display of his extraordinary versatility. Mr. Stevens will be supported by the charming Tina Marshall. This will be Stevens' first appearance here since he took New York by storm as the star of the Henry W. Savage production of "The Devil." The De Haven Sextette with Sydney C. Gibson will produce a dancing operetta "The Understudy." Howard's Musical Ponies and Comedy Canines will be seen in an act that is decidedly novel. Milt Wood, "The Dancer with the Chair," is expected to be a distinct hit. Next week will be the last of Lulu McConnell and Grant Simpson, Bobby Pandur and Brother, The Tempest and Sunshine Trio and that stirring military act, "Our Boys in Blue," which is being received with great enthusiasm. A new series of motion pictures will be given.

SCENE FROM THE GREAT COMEDY SUCCESS, "MR. HOPKINSON"

Faversham in Stephen Phillips' "Herod"

The responsible critics of New York are agreed that in daring to produce Stephen Phillips' poetical drama of "Herod," William Faversham has greatly increased his stature as an artist. For nine years this beautiful tragedy has lain within reach of New York stars, but it remained for Faversham to present it to a metropolitan audience and there is no doubt that in so doing he has performed a service for the theatre which is helping to redeem it from the charges of inconsequence and vulgarity brought against it recently by serious students. While giving generous credit to the production and to the star and his clever wife, Louis V. De Foe, the World's dramatic critic, is constrained to point out that "Mr. Faversham falls short of expressing the full sweep of Herod's passion or of grasping and projecting the terrible complexities of his character in the earlier scenes of the tragedy. Physical disability may have emphasized these limitations on the opening night. His opportunity came, however, in the final act, and he rose to it nobly. As the barefooted, distraught King he became then an impressive, piteous figure and he acted the scenes with an imaginative power which he has not indicated in any production in which he has appeared heretofore. The tendency to posture and proneness to overelaboration which, in the past, have marred Miss Opp's acting really aid her in her performance of Mariamne. She is beautiful to the eye, dignified in presence and of regal mien. The full beauty and force of her lines sometimes escape her, but she moves through the play an impressive figure."

Among the attractions coming here are George M. Cohan, Fritzi Scheff, Wright Lorimer, David Warfield, Wm. H. Crane and Marie Cahill.

George M. Cohan himself will be seen in the leading role of "The Yankee Prince" when that musical success is produced at the Van Ness Theatre following "The Talk of New York."

PROPER DRESS GUIDE FOR FORMAL OCCASIONS

Day or Evening

No man enjoys going to any affair whether it be his own or his friend's wedding or a stag party, with a doubt in his mind as to whether he is properly attired. Very few, who seldom or often attend formal affairs care to attract attention by conspicousness of inaccurate or careless dress. Conspicousness therefore is seldom caused by a willing desire to appear different from any one else for very few can afford to be the observed of all eyes. Undue attention is attracted either by carelessness or, and this is often the case, by misinformation. The writer therefore takes great pleasure in covering this subject as much as is in his power. For a man to dress properly on all occasions there are certain raiments which are absolutely necessary, and these articles of dress are but few and of little monetary consequence if compared to the needs of women. This outfit once properly procured will last a man for some time, and only now and then a few accessories like ties, etc., will be necessary to refresh it. The following will complete a man's outfit:

Full Dress—Swallow Tail, Overcoat—Raincoat, White Dress Vest, Silk Hat, White Shirt, cuffs attached, Poke or round top collar, White Tie, White Kid Gloves, White Cape, Patent Boots with Button, White Pearl Set (Link and Studs).

Informal Dress—Dinner Suit, black, white, grey Waistcoat, Derby Hat, Pleated Shirt, Fold or Wing Collar, Black or Grey Tie, Grey Suede Calfskin Boots, Gold Studs (Links or Smoked Pearl).

Formal Day Dress—Cutaway Suit or Frock Suit, Trousers of Striped Material, Waistcoat, Grey Flannel or White Linen, High Silk Hat, Plain White Shirt and Cuffs Attached, Collars, Poke or Fold, Scarf, Grey or Pearl, Once Over or Ascot, Scarf Pin, Patent Leather Boots.

Speaking of formal evening dress; there is only one correct style at present, the swallow tail or full dress coat of which a cut is given, a white pique or silk waistcoat and trousers of same material as coat. The lines of the dress coat are very similar to those shown in the dress coats worn by our English cousins and the edge of the lapel is faced with silk.

With this coat a white pique or silk waistcoat is the only proper thing as shown by accompanying cut below. The design of this year's waistcoat is vastly different from last season's "V" shape. It is more of a "U" shape or egg shape, the "U" shape predominating. Under no consideration, however, is it proper to wear anything but white for either tie or waistcoat. The waistcoats shown have a little elastic to connect with the trousers so that they may lay smooth while sitting. They may have either three or four buttons.

The trousers may have braid at side or not, but braid is the more popular.

Materials for Full Dress

For coat and trousers the rougher fabrics of either diagonal weave or Barathea are the correct thing at present. However, some conservative dressers, still prefer the smoother Barathea weave, which, while it is not as popular, is quite correct. For waistcoats, as said before either pique or silk, is correct.

Shirts—Ties—Jewelry

While the plain linen bosom is always correct the stripe or pleated effects are a bit smarter. This also goes with the tie. Speaking of the tie, the new perfect dress tie which can be buttoned to collar button front and back is quite an improvement over the old style. These ties which are to be tied by wearer come in slightly different shapes with either rounded corners or pointed, as desired by wearer. In jewelry very little that is ostentatious is shown or worn. For the full dress, pearl studs with links to match in white. For the dinner (Tuxedo) suit smoked pearl or dull gold.

New evening coat, showing long curving lines at the front

Gloves—Collars—Shoes—Hose

For full dress heavy buckskin tan or white chamoise gloves, which should be replaced in the dressing room or carriage by white kid gloves. For the dinner suit grey or chamois gloves. In regard to shoes for full dress, either high patent leather buttons or low shoes and for dinner suits, calf.

Collars can be worn straight up (the poke) or little round top. A very pretty style of this kind is made in England and sold largely here; it is called the "Midford." Hose should always be black.

Before closing this article we would like to call attention to the fact that it is always safe, whenever in doubt what to wear for an evening affair, if there are ladies present, to wear the full dress suit; not only because it is correct but one is apt to affront one's host or hostess by dressing beneath the dignity of the occasion. As stated before, the Tuxedo bears the same relation towards the dress suit as does the sack towards the dignified Prince Albert or cutaway for formal day wear.

their scope to embrace the whole State. That year saw the start of the State Building Trades Council of which McCarthy has been president from its inception. In the State organization there are now some 54,000 members while the local council has a roll of between 25,000 and 27,000. A comparison of these figures with the figures which stood for unionism in 1894 gives a clue to the meaning behind McCarthy's words when he asseverates that he would not forego the presidency of the State Building Trades Council for the presidency of the United States.

McCarthy has frequently been spoken of as the carpenter of the California Hotel, the term implying labor of the humblest kind. Here is a point where McCarthy would disappoint the seeker for the conventional story of the self-made man. He does not speak of himself as the hotel carpenter at all; he does not say that he ever did manual work on the hotel. His words are these:

"From the time that the California Hotel was waterproof I was placed in charge of it and I had as easy access to the combination of the safe as to any of the accommodations of the hotel."

Beyond that McCarthy would not label the character of his services for the management of the old hostelry. In 1903, he stated, the Building Trades Council asked him to dissociate himself from the hotel and to devote all his time to the work of labor organization and he accordingly did so.

Interesting as McCarthy's industrial career has been, it is when he has been induced to tell of his political experiences that his conversation becomes racy and stimulating. McCarthy has been in many camps, republican, democratic and union labor and it has been his experience to suffer revilement by his former friends while making terms with former enemies. That of course is part of the game of politics as it is played in the United States; but it is unusual for a politician to be pursued by his former associates with the animosity which has had McCarthy for its mark.

It has frequently been said that, so far as politics was concerned, McCarthy was "discovered" by Superior Judge William P. Lawlor. Judge Lawlor was chairman of the democratic committee which had charge of the local silver campaign when Bryan first ran for president and he undoubtedly put McCarthy on the stump as a silver orator. But the matter of "discovery" is an involved one, presenting as many difficulties as the controversy between Cook and Peary. McCarthy claims that he "discovered" Lawlor.

"A learned gentleman," says McCarthy, "who supported life during several years by eating olives, claims that he discovered me, whereas it was I who picked him up and made him. I obtained for him the chairmanship of that committee. And I might add that I had been making speeches for silver before he knew that silver half dollars were being coined. I refer to Judge Lawlor."

However that may be, certain it is that McCarthy who came to this city as a republican and a protectionist, first went on the stump for democracy and silver. It was his first prominence as a politician. Then came the draft of a charter which contained a provision for convict labor in the streets. McCarthy fought and helped to beat it. When the meeting which inaugurated the New Charter movement was called in Academy of Sciences Hall, McCarthy attended and spoke for the project and when mayor-elect Phelan named the charter commitee of 100, McCarthy was a member. When the charter convention named its ticket of fifteen freeholders, McCarthy was one of the freeholders and he tells with pride that he polled the sixth highest vote, although particular efforts were made to defeat him.

"One man who was prominent in that attempt," says McCarthy, "made the remark: 'I'll get that so-and-so.' That man, by the way, is still alive."

As a freeholder McCarthy was active in framing the provisions for an eight-hour day and for a minimum wage of $2 a day for city laborers. When the New Charter was adopted and Mayor Phelan was empowered to appoint the various commissioners, he sent for McCarthy, according to the latter's story.

"Phelan stood with his back against the door," says McCarthy, "and argued with me for half an hour to go on the civil service commission. I refused, saying that I had too many other duties to attend to. It was only when Phelan put me in a hole by saying: 'Well, then, am I to tell the laboring men of this city that you refuse to accept the one position which is of vital importance to you?' that I agreed to accept the appointment; but in doing so I told him that he was taking an unfair advantage of me.

"In spite of this incident and in spite of the fact that I received letters containing offers of money as bribes for positions, which letters I turned over to the commission, Phelan has stated in his recent speeches that I went to him and asked to be appointed to the board of public works and he has further stated that I knew vast sums were to be expended by that board, insinuating that I had my eyes on the dollar. That is a lie; the facts are as I have stated them."

McCarthy remained for four years on the civil service commission and left it for private life. He was opposed to Schmitz during the latter's first two campaigns, but joined forces in the third and final contest. He says that Schmitz made him several offers of public position but that he always refused to accept anything.

"I joined the union labor forces," explains McCarthy, "because the two big parties had combined against them; but I stated from the stage of the Alhambra Theatre that I would take no office or commission and I did not."

It will be seen that pretty nearly ever since McCarthy's arrival in this city his associations have been with big men and big things. He is not untrained in the social amenities, either, for, as he sets forth himself, he was chairman of the reception committee on the occasion of former President McKinley's visit in this city and spent every minute he could possibly spare from a domestic affliction in the company of the chief executive. He has had lots of experience in organization, in combat and in the finesse of politics; he has held public office; he has helped frame our organic law; he has stood in the forefront of the tremendous struggle of labor for recognition. It remains to be seen how he will apply the matured experiences of his forty-six years.

which suddenly break the lull of a tempest and sweep over the horizon leaving a trail of shivered trees, from time to time the thought returned with a bitter pang, "I am going to drown myself because I have no father."

It was a warm and beautiful day. The grass was heated beneath the genial rays of the sun, and the water shone like a mirror. Simon had some moments of pure happiness, of that languor which is the sequence of tears, and the desire came over him to lay himself to sleep there in the warm meadow.

A little green frog jumped at his feet. He tried to catch it. It escaped. He ran after it and made three vain attempts to seize it, one after the other. At last he just caught hold of one of the hind feet, and it made him laugh to see the animal's attempts to get away. It doubled up its long legs, then suddenly shot straight out, its hind legs rigid like two metal bars, while it beat the air with its forepaws, which waved about like a pair of hands, and all the time its eyes stood out, glazed within their yellow rims. It reminded him of a plaything of his, tin soldiers at the end of a sort of zigzag latticework of wooden bars, which could be made to shoot out and back again like the frog's legs, and so to put the soldiers through their drill. That made him think of home, then of his mother, and then the bitterness came over him again, and the tears began anew. Shudders passed all through him; he knelt down and said his prayers as before going to sleep. But he could not finish, for the sobs came quickly and tempestuously, and at last quite overpowered him. He no longer thought or saw anything around him, but abandoned himself to his tears.

Suddenly a heavy hand was laid on his shoulder, and a deep voice demanded: "What is all the trouble about, my little man?"

Simon turned round. A big man in working clothes, with curly black hair and beard, was looking at him with a kindly expression. He replied in a choking voice, with his eyes still full of tears, "They have beaten me—be-cause—I—I have no father."

"Why, said the man, "everybody has a father."

Between his sobs the child forced out the words, "I—I—haven't—one."

The workman became grave. He had recognized la Blanchotte's son, and, though he was a newcomer to the district, he had learned something of her story. "Come," he said, "dry your tears, my lad, and let me take you home to your mother. Perhaps we'll find a father for you."

They set off together, Simon's little hand resting in the man's great fist. The man was smiling again. He was not sorry of a chance to see la Blanchotte, who was said to be one of the handsomest women of the district. They came to a little white cottage, beautifully kept. "Here we are," said the child, and he cried "Mama!"

A woman appeared, and the smile died suddenly from the workman's lips, for he understood in a flash that this woman was never again to be trifled with. Tall, pale, and dignified, she stood in the doorway as though to prohibit any man from entering that house where one man had already betrayed her. The workman was abashed; cap in hand, he stammered out: "Pardon, madam, I am bringing back your little boy, who had lost himself at the riverside."

But Simon flung both arms about his mother's neck and, bursting into fresh tears, said to her: "No, mother, I was going to drown myself, because the other boys have beaten me—beaten me—for not having a father."

A crimson flame blazed on the woman's face. With a movement of anguish she snatched up the child and kissed him passionately, while a swift burst of tears ran down her cheeks. The man stood still, affected by her emotion and not knowing how to leave. But Simon suddenly ran towards him and cried, "Will you be my father?"

There was a moment's silence. La Blanchotte, mute and overcome by shame, was leaning against the wall, pressing both hands to her heart. Seeing that none replied, the child began again: "If you won't be my father, I shall go back to drown myself."

The workman passed it off a joke and replied with a laugh, "All right, I'll be your father."

"What do they call you?" was the child's next question, "so that I can tell the others when they ask me your name."

"Philip," replied the man.

Simon kept quiet a moment, to be certain that the name sank into his mind. Then, happy once more, he stretched out both hands, saying, "Very well, Philip, you are my father."

The workman lifted him from the ground and pressed a hasty kiss on each cheek, then fled as quickly as he could.

When the child arrived at school next morning he was greeted with derisive laughter, and after school his tormentor of the previous day was about to renew the attack. Simon, as though hurling a stone at his head, threw these words at him: "My father's name is Philip."

Shouts of laughter broke out on all sides. "Philip?—Philip who?—Philip what?—what's the good of a name like that?—where did you pick him up, this Philip of yours?"

Simon made no answer. His faith was unshaken, and he looked defiantly at them, ready to suffer anything rather than flee before them. The schoolmaster rescued him, and he returned to his mother's house.

During the next three months Philip, the big workman, often found himself near la Blanchotte's cottage. Sometimes when he saw her sewing at the window he summoned up courage to talk to her. She answered politely, yet always gravely, never laughing with him, and never letting him cross her threshold. But, like most men, Philip was a little conceited, and he fancied that when she spoke to him there was often more color than usual on her cheeks.

But a shattered reputation is difficult to build up again, and is ever afterwards but fragile, and despite la Blanchotte's unyielding reserve, the gossips were already busy about her name.

Simon was immensely fond of his new father, and went out with him nearly every evening after work was over. He went regularly to school, and held his head very high among his fellows, never paying attention to their taunts. But one day the boy who had opened the attack on him began again: "You are a liar. You haven't got a father called Philip."

"How do you make that out?" asked Simon in agitation.

The boy leered and chuckled. "Because if you had one," he replied, "he would be married to your mother."

The argument was sound, and Simon was troubled. Nevertheless he answered, "He is my father, all the same."

"Maybe," said the other with a grin, "but he is not a proper sort of father."

La Blanchotte's child went away with his head bowed, deep in thought. He went towards old Loizon's forge, where Philip worked.

The forge was buried among the trees. It was very dark, and only the red blaze of the furnace with its flickering glare illumined five bare-armed smiths, who filled the shed with the resounding clang of their hammers on the anvil. In the lurid glare of the forge they looked like five demons. They were standing upright, their eyes fixed on the white-hot iron which they were forging, and their heavy thoughts followed the rise and fall of their hammers.

Simon entered unnoticed. He went up and pulled his friend by the sleeve. Philip turned; suddenly the work ceased and all the men watched with great attention. In the midst of this unwonted silence, up rose the childish voice: "Tell me, Philip, what that boy meant who told me just now that you were not a proper sort of father."

"How did he make that out?" said Philip.

With childish innocence Simon replied, "Because you are not married to my mother."

No one laughed. Philip stood lost in dreams, resting his brow on one great hand, while his elbow rested on the shaft of his hammer which stood on the anvil. His four companions stood watching him, and Simon, a tiny figure among the giants, waited anxiously. Suddenly one of the smiths, answering the thought which was in all their minds, spoke to Philip: "Well, they can say what they like, la Blanchotte is a fine girl and a good one, and she has plenty of grit and steadiness despite her misfortune. She would make as good a wife as anyone could wish, if she had the right man."

"That's true, every word of it," said the three others.

"Is it her fault, poor girl," continued the workman, "that she went wrong? The man had promised to marry her, and I know more than one woman who did just the same as this one and whom everybody respects now."

"True, every word," replied the three men in chorus.

He went on: "What suffering it has cost her, poor girl, to bring up this boy by herself, and what she has gone through during these years she has never left the house except to go to church, God only knows."

"True, every bit of it," said the others.

For a space nothing was heard but the whistle of the furnace-blast. Then Philip, with a brusque movement, bent towards Simon. "Go and tell your mother that I am coming to speak to her tonight."

Then he took the child by the shoulders and pushed him outside.

He returned to his work, and with a single sound the five hammers fell together on the anvils. Powerful, vigorous, joyful in the mastery of their work, the five men continued to swing their hammers until nightfall. But just as the deep boom of a cathedral peal dominates over the tinkling carillons in the parish churches, so Philip's hammer smote the anvil, second after second, with a mighty clang that drowned the others. And there was a light in his eye as he turned passionately to his work amid the flying smithy sparks.

The sky was full of stars when he knocked at la Blanchotte's door. He was wearing his Sunday blouse and a new shirt, and his beard was carefully trimmed. The young woman appeared at the door. She had a pained expression, and she said to him: "You ought not to come like this, after dark, Mr. Philip."

He would have liked to reply, but he could only stand before her, confused and stammering.

She continued: "And all the time you know perfectly well that I cannot have any more talk about my name."

Then he suddenly found his tongue: "But what does all that matter, if you will only be my wife?"

No answer came to this, but he thought he heard from the darkness of the room a noise as of a body sinking down. He entered quickly, and Simon, lying on his bed, heard the sound of a kiss and of some words murmured by his mother in a low voice. Then all at once he felt himself lifted in the hands of his friend, who, like the Hercules he was, held him out at arm's length and shouted, "You can tell your schoolmates that your father is Philip Remy the blacksmith, and that he will box anyone's ears who hurts you."

Next day, when the schoolroom was full and lessons were about to commence, little Simon rose, pale and with trembling lips, and said in a clear voice, "My father is Philip Remy the blacksmith, and he has promised to box anyone's ears who hurts me."

This time there was no longer any laughter, for everybody knew Philip Remy the blacksmith, and he was a man whom anyone might well be proud to have for father.

Auto Notes

Thomas T. Roe, at one time one of the most widely famed bicycle riders in America and the same Tom Roe who rode a high-wheeled bicycle from San Francisco to Chicago in 1889, has joined the forces of the local branch of the Studebaker Bros. Company in the capacity of expert demonstrator. Tom is pretty well along in years now and perhaps too old to ever attempt another such ride, but he is not too old to drive an automobile, and that he can do, say the local Studebaker managers, to please every fancy.

The Diamond Rubber Company of this city is just in receipt of advices from their factory that Diamond Tires equipped the two Lozier cars that won first and second place in the Brighton Beach twenty-four hour race in New York. The Lozier cars winning the event established a new world's record of 1196 miles.

The Studebaker E-M-F "30" which recently broke the world's record by making five and one-quarter miles in six minutes and fifty-seven and two-fifths seconds at a two days' automobile race meet in Rome, Georgia, clipped five seconds off its own record the second day of the meet. The skill of the driver and the splendid performance of the car in a field of seven popular priced gasoline cars so pleased the entrants that the same machine will be entered in the Atlantic races next month.

L. S. Quinan, a well known automobile driver of this city has become associated with the Studebaker Bros. Company in the capacity of expert demonstrator. Quinan is regarded as one of the cleverest drivers in the city.

In a recent interview relative to the racing of automobiles, Henry Ford, President of the Ford Motor Company, said: "Classification according to price is not a fair one for the manufacturer whose product, while selling at a low price, is competing in sales with cars at higher prices. Of what benefit is it to us to defeat cars in class 6 in a class A race? And yet the rules limit us to this class in a stock car event. Classification according to weight puts a premium on weight. Without referring to the prespective merits of the light and heavy weights in automobile construction, we do not concede the right of any organization to decide for us the proportion that shall exist between weight and piston displacement. This is purely a matter of design and should be left to the manufacturer. As it is now, no Ford car is eligible for entry to class B races, for while our piston displacement puts us in class 4 our light weight makes entry impossible in that class. The proper racing classification is one that considers cylinder displacement only."

C. E. Mathewson, manager of The Diamond Rubber Company's local establishment, has been at the factories in Akron, Ohio, the past week attending the annual conference of the salesmen. A feature of this meeting was a broadening of the Diamond policy of inviting motorists' co-operation toward obtaining the greatest degree of tire service. A better tire than ever before with "ample inflation always," the watchword, is the essence of the plan.

"In several thousand miles of touring in Europe this year the tires I bought gave me nothing like the service I get with American tires," says H. A. Hoover, a banker in Spokane. "So long as I had Diamond tires all went smoothly, but when I had to buy foreign tires I found their mileage capacity very much less."

R. S. Luther has just returned from a most enjoyable trip to Modesto with C. N. Davidson in the latter's new Chalmers-Detroit thirty horsepower car and reports the roads in the San Joaquin Valley to be in splendid condition.

Considering the types of cars in the Los Angeles-Phoenix race against which the Studebaker E-M-F "30" was pitted, the performance of that car in finishing third, its time being 24 hours, 56 minutes and 40 seconds, is regarded as one of the most remarkable performances of an automobile of its class now being manufactured.

The Pioneer Automobile Company, through its secretary R. M. Pike, announces that it has just closed a contract for the agency of the Babcock Electric car which is manufactured in Buffalo, New York. In speaking of the new line of cars, Mr. Pike says: "We intend to go into the electric business very aggressively. We have investigated all the different electric machines built, and in our opinion the Babcock Electric is the best. We have a demonstrating car en route, which is due here within a week or ten days. The company builds a full line of cars in runabouts, broughams, landaulets and electric busses. The Babcock car goes further on a charge than any other car on the market and is noted for its speed and hill climbing abilities, and should be especially good for California. The car will make an average of thirty miles an hour on an ordinary road. Our decision to go into the electric car business was brought about by the number of inquiries received during the last twelve months."

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 25901.

SOPHIA McKILLOP, Plaintiff,
vs.
ROBERT E. McKILLOP, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Robert E. McKillop, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within the City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant on the ground of defendant's Extreme Cruelty; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of October, A. D. 1909.

Letters

The "Isle of Dead Ships"

Wallace Irwin once lamented:

"I have scoured all the earth to its farthest demesne
For some as-yet-undescribed spot,
And long I have fared, but yet none have I seen
Not used long ago in a plot."

Perhaps Crittenden Marriott is not the first pioneer into the Saragosso Sea, but at all events it is territory not often enough invaded for any one to feel crowded for sea room therein. There is a word-of-mouth tradition amongst sailors unversed in book lore to the effect that derelicts of all ages since the Atlantic was first navigated have been gathered by the currents into a compact mass in the midst of the floating weed of this unexplored region, almost the last unknown spot on the surface of the planet, and the imaginative or credulous tell strange tales of treasure galleons, lost packets which antedate the days of steam, steamers supposed to have sunk with all on board, freighters in every branch of the trade, and samples of every craft afloat keeping ghostly company until they disintegrate through age and disappear forever. Mr. Marriott has imagined a modern ocean steamer, abandoned in a storm save by three of her passengers, two of whom had been overlooked and the third rescued from one of the small boats which capsized, drifting into this "Isle of Dead Ships." They were a curiously assorted trio, an officer of the United States navy under sentence of death for murder who had escaped from the penitentiary and made his way to the West Indies only to be recaptured; the detective in charge of the prisoner, and the millionaire daughter of a railway magnate. The steamer which encountered a derelict immediately after a heavy storm, was supposed to be in a sinking condition but though she was hopelessly disabled she remained afloat and the three involuntary passengers suffered no immediate hardship for food, clothing or other comfort. Lieutenant Howard was the only one of the three who realized the condition of affairs, for Miss Fairfax, accustomed all her life to be provided for, simply took it for granted that something would happen to save her, while Jackson, the detective seemed to imagine that Howard, a sailor, could be compelled to navigate the vessel when it became necessary, and that the reason why he accepted the inevitable so calmly was that he preferred drowning to electrocution. Howard had hope that if there did exist the fabled concourse of masterless ships in the midst of the Saragosso, he could find either some navigable craft or tools and other material from which to construct one, but that until then there was nothing to be done. In course of time the Queen drifted into the pack, and the involuntary travelers, supposing themselves to be alone and the first who had ever penetrated its mystery, soon discovered that there was a colony of over a score of derelicts, some of whom had lived there nearly twenty years, maintaining themselves in comfort and luxury from the salvage of the ships and for the most part, indifferent to the big world outside. They had a code of laws and a despotic ruler, and though nominally communists, really had neither liberty nor property except by the consent of King Forbes. Howard's first act, on coming into the settlement, was to exasperate Forbes who had him imprisoned in what turned out to be the operating room of a wreck equipped with a wireless outfit. The colonists had been too long marooned, and were too ignorant at best to know what the strange instruments were meant for, and finding the plant in good shape, the prisoner took the opportunity to send out a call which was answered from the naval station at Guantanamo, and thus set in motion the first wheels of the machinery of liberation. Some of King Forbes' laws, which he undertook to enforce, were so obnoxious that, joined by three others of the settlement, the Queen's trio decided to separate themselves as far as possible from the rest, and while on their journey across obstacles as impeding as the ice hummocks of a polar expedition, pursued by Forbes and his adherents, with their rapid progress blocked still further by a wide fissure of water between the wrecks, they came across a submarine which Howard recalled as having been lost from a Spanish cruiser. Again the all-round knowledge of the naval man came to the rescue and hastily embarking his comrades and the treasure they had stumbled upon, he put forth under the sea only to have as many startling adventures below as above water. No reader who follows the course of events on board the derelict Queen or during the sojourn at Saragosso would be willing to believe that the gallant Lieutenant Howard was a criminal, so the murder mystery is cleared away simultaneously with the rescue of the party of derelicts, the submarine taken in charge and adopted by the American navy, and, a wrecking company formed to enrich itself on the treasures to be salvaged from the lost galleons. It goes without saying that a naval lieutenant and a girl are the major and minor propositions of a syllogism, and the epilogue leaves the pleasant intimation that out of the profits of the Sea Shark Wrecking Company, the man who, in the first chapter, was in grave danger of an ignominious death, is in a fair way to become as wealthy as his railroad magnate father-in-law. It is a good tale of adventure of an unusual kind, and if not particularly educative, is intensely interesting. Published by the J. B. Lippincott Co.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 18976, Dept. No. 10.

MRS. KATHERINE SINCLAIR and JOHN WILLIAM SINCLAIR, Jr., Plaintiffs,

vs.

All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California, to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants, Greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Mrs. Katherine Sinclair and John William Sinclair, Jr., plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the Southerly line of Greenwich Street, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-two (122) feet, four (4) inches Westerly from the Westerly line of Scott Street; running thence Westerly and along the said Southerly line of Greenwich Street, fifty-three (53) feet, seven (7) inches; thence at right angles Southerly eighty-two (82) feet; thence at right angles Easterly forty-three (43) feet, two (2) inches; thence Northeasterly fifteen (15) feet; thence Easterly seven (7) feet, eight (8) inches; and thence at right angles Northerly sixty-eight (68) feet, nine (9) inches to the Southerly line of Greenwich Street and the point of commencement.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the Complaint, to-wit: for judgment establishing and quieting said plaintiffs title to all said real property as the owners thereof in fee simple, and determining all adverse claims thereto, and ascertaining and determining all states, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property and every part thereof, and for such other and further relief as may be just and proper in the premises, under and pursuant to the provisions of the Act of the Legislature of California entitled, "An Act to provide for the establishment and quieting of title to real property in case of loss and destruction of public records," approved June 16, 1906.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Court this First day of November, A. D. 1909.

(Seal)

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk
By JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 24,299, Dept. 12.

ELLA REEVES, Plaintiff,
vs.
JOHN T. REEVES, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to JOHN T. REEVES, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion and wilful neglect, and determining and adjudging that plaintiff is the owner of the certain real property described in the complaint herein, as her separate property, and also for alimony and counsel fees; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 23d day of July, A. D. 1909.

THE ETERNAL COMEDY

With Two Players

Sunday passed, Tuesday rolled around, and still his tall form did not loom in the vestibule when the cuckoo clock was sounding eight. Thursday he came, and the beautiful girl was burning with wrath.

"So this is the way you neglect me," she hissed. "What have you to say for yourself? Why didn't you come?"

"I couldn't," faltered the young man. "I had dyspepsia, and the doctor advised me not to come."

"What? The doctor told you not to come to see me because you had dyspepsia?"

"Well, he told me to keep away from all sweets."

The next moment she had him seated on the palor sofa telling him he was the nicest young man in the world.

"But, Freddy, I don't see that you need be so heart-broken because Mabel Flyaway has jilted you."

"It isn't the jilting I mind, but she returned the ring in a parcel marked 'Glass. With Care.'"

Retort Sarcastic

A young man and a young woman lean over the front gate. They are lovers. It is moonlight. He is loath to leave, as the parting is the last. He is about to go away. She is reluctant to see him depart. They swing on the gate.

"I shall never forget you," he says; "and, if death should claim me, my last thoughts will be of you."

"I'll be true to you," she sobs. "I'll never see anybody else or love them as long as I live."

* * * * *

Six years later he returns. His sweetheart of former years has married. They meet at a party. She has changed greatly; between the dances the recognition takes place.

"Let me see," she muses, with her fan beating a tattoo on her pretty hand, "was it you or your brother who was my old sweetheart?"

"Really, I don't know," he says; "probably my father."

"And do you doubt my love?" he asked, passionately.

"No, Samuel," she answered, with admirable tact; "but when you say that the day you call me yours will usher in an era of lifelong devotion and tender solicitude you—pardon me, dear—you put it on a trifle too thick. You seem to forget, Samuel, that I am a widow."

As William bent over her fair face he whispered, "Darling, if I should ask you in French if I might kiss you, what would you answer?"

She, calling up her scanty knowledge of the French language, exclaimed, "Billet doux."

Daughter: "This piano is really my very own, isn't it, papa?"

Father: "Yes, my dear."

"And when I marry I can take it with me, can I?"

"Certainly, my child. But don't tell anyone; it might spoil your chances."

Not What She Wanted

He was pleading his cause earnestly. "I am wealthy," he said, "and could make ample provision for you."

She nodded and checked one point off on her fingers.

"I have had experience with the world," he continued.

She checked off another point.

"I have passed the frivolous age," he went on, "and I have the steadfastness, the caution, and the wisdom to guard and guide you well."

He paused for answer.

"The points you make are strong ones," she said, "but they lead undeviatingly to the conclusion that you would make an excellent father for me. You have all the necessary qualifications, but just now I am looking for a husband."

Jack: "Miss Westend is the most circumspect young lady I ever met."

Tom: "How so?"

Jack: "She refused to accompany me on the piano without her chaperon the other evening."

The Water Project

Apparently we are as far removed from a solution of the water problem as we were when we first persuaded ourselves that we should find a source of supply amid the eternal snows of the Sierras. A short time ago it was supposed that we had perfected arrangements to pipe water to this city from the Hetch-Hetchy Valley, but now this project is shrouded in uncertainty. As yet we have become possessed of no vested interests in that valley, no inalienable rights which might justify us in burdening ourselves with a prodigious debt for the purpose of defraying the cost of constructing works. Equally uncertain and indefinite is the local situation with respect to the Spring Valley Water Company upon which we must depend for water until another source of supply is obtained. It must be evident even to persons of the dullest apprehension that instead of making progress toward a solution of the problem we are adding to our perplexities and becoming more bewildered as time passes. There has been too much bungling about this water project, too much political maneuvering for the advancement of self-interest rather than for the interest of the public. The difficulties that have arisen have been due not so much to the intricacy of the problem to be solved as to the incapacity and insincerity of the officials who have had it in hand. From the beginning their chief object has been their own glorification, and to that end they have provoked antagonisms with a view to vindicating their heroic and sublime devotion to the interests of the people. They have been representing not the people but the political and social enemies of men who have private interests to protect, and who, though not unselfish themselves, are far from being as unreasonable or as hoggish as the corporation-baiters would have us believe. Nothing could more clearly exemplify the puerility and insincerity of some of the younger members of the Board of Supervisors than their behaviour last week when the Spring Valley Water Company submitted a proposition to arbitrate the question of values. They have spent much of their time during the past two years accusing the officers of that corporation of demanding an outrageously exorbitant price for their plant and property, but when they were invited to arbitrate they assumed an attitude of suspicion, and wondered for publication whether the octopus wasn't playing the part of the cuttle-fish. Some of them suggested the possibility that the proposition to arbitrate was designed to delude the public, but at the same time, insensible of the implied paradox, they pronounced the overtures of the company on the whole a great victory for the people. Now whatever may be thought of the overtures as a whole which the corporation has addressed to the Supervisors, the offer to arbitrate the question of valuation is certainly a plain unequivocal business proposition, but the young gentlemen who have been conducting negotiations in the Hetch-Hetchy matter, and who have been very eager to spend an enormous sum of public money in building water works under the direct supervision of that illustrious job-holder Marsdon Manson, have not the business temperament and are not to be impressed by propositions that appeal to business men. They have consecrated themselves to the exhilarating pastime of circumventing public service corporations for the greater glory of themselves and the gratification of their masters. Victories for the pee-pul are what they are after, and to produce the aspect of victory it is necessary to make it appear that somebody has suffered defeat. Hence the game of battledore and shuttlecock with which the taxpayers have been surfeited. That this game is at an end we ought not to conclude from the mere circumstance that "the way was cleared" for a bond election last Monday, as reported by one of the dailies. Our Supervisors are extraordinarily deft in clearing the way for bond elections, but in other matters of perhaps greater importance they are painfully awkward. They have cleared the way for a bond election of $45,000,000, but it has been discovered that Mr. Marsdon Manson, the engineer in whose talents the Supervisors have faith illimitable had neglected to compute interest on the bonds during the period of construction. As interest will amount to $10,125,000 the whole cost of construction, it now appears, will be $55,825,000. How many oversights are to be discovered as we go along remains to be seen. From past experience and the present outlook it is not unwise to prepare ourselves for innumerable vexatious and costly developments. In the end, if we do not watch out, we shall probably be paying a much higher rate for water than even the most greedy public service corporation would have the face to demand.

Too Many University Men

Supervisor Broderick is taken to task in the Examiner by an editorial writer for saying, "Nobody has any show to obtain employment in the Bureau of Engineering unless he is a graduate of Stanford or Berkeley, and that's what causes all the trouble." The Examiner man assumes that Mr. Broderick is prejudiced against men of education, and naively observes that it may be better to employ graduates of our universities "at the work they learned" than to give the job to "one of the boys who has devoted his time to the gentle art of hustling votes." This observation is not to be cavilled at, but from what Supervisor Broderick has said we infer that graduates of Berkeley and Stanford are employed at work they have not learned. Why should it be assumed that graduates of Berkeley and Stanford are competent to do the work for which they have been trained after a fashion during their university career? There has been a good deal of bungling in the Bureau of Engineering. Now if there is in that department a large preponderance of talent from our universities is it not likely that Mr. Broderick has hit the nail on the head? At any rate the circumstances of the matter justify the conclusion that he is more competent to pass judgment on the matter than the Examiner's editorial writer.

Undergraduate Ignorance

The past year or so has witnessed a most healthy examination of conscience on the part of university presidents, regents and professors with the result that from many sections of the country comes the confession that our higher education is not all that it should be. It is a most stimulating discovery and one which augurs well for future university training. From the acknowledgment of fault to earnest striving for amendment is a short step whether in matters theological, educational or others and there are many evidences that our universities are trying to make the advance. It has been found, not without considerable consternation, that undergraduates are very often amazingly ignorant and that graduates are deplorably lacking in some of the essentials of liberal culture. One of the most encouraging signs of the times is that these humiliating discoveries have been made, not so much by college presidents or college dons, but by college graduates who are far enough removed from the influence of their universities to see things worldly and things collegiate in their proper perspective. When graduates begin to pick flaws in their educational equipment reforms are bound to ensue, for the sons of graduates must perforce be the undergraduates of the future or the colleges will go untenanted. An association of alumni can wield a stronger influence for good on their beloved college than half a dozen student bodies or a dozen imposing faculties. But the graduates are not alone in discovering the depth and intensity of undergraduate ignorance. The professors have been making experiments which have led to the same conclusion. Thus, in Brown University, the professor of history has applied some elementary tests to his twenty-four students with startling results. Not one man in the class could give correctly the full names of the president of the United States, a justice of the supreme court of the United States, the governor of Rhode Island, a justice of the supreme court of Rhode Island and the mayor of Providence. Eighteen of the class gave correctly the president's full name and two knew only his last name. Not one succeeded in giving the full name of a justice of the supreme court of the United States; but seventeen gave a name partly correct. Seven could not give even the last name of a justice. In view of the fact that the systematic reading of a local newspaper might be supposed sufficient to supply the students with information on these subjects, it is certainly disconcerting to find them so deficient. But there is no need for repining. Out of the humiliation of exposed ignorance will grow that liberal culture which, say what we may, is really a passion with a large element of our population. This sort of ignorance is far from invincible and the exploitation of it is the one great step toward its eradication.

Law Reform

Nobody can be oblivious of the fact that at the present moment there are in this country many grave problems calling for immediate solution. These problems are springing up on all sides of us. Of the gravity of these problems we are assured by the empirical dabblers and half-baked philosophers to whom is due the credit of their discovery. Upon the solution of these problems must depend the destiny and welfare of the American people for generations to come. So we are told, and so we believe, and hence the national passion for setting things right which is kept aglow by vociferous propagandists who have let loose an enthusiastic fury akin to that which inspired Joshua and Elijah of old. We are preoccupied with the everlasting struggle between good and evil, which is the main purpose of human existence, and we seem to have lost sight of the fact that the concrete matters which engage our attention are embarrassed with the difficulties that are inherent in human nature. Take for example the matter of legal reform. All over the country the notion is prevalent that the administration of justice is not what it should be. Doubtless this is true, but accompanying this notion is the idea that law can be made a substitute for common sense and public morality. Furthermore it is assumed that the present state of things is due to degeneration, whereas it is the result of the growing complexity of human affairs. We make allowance for the shortcomings resulting from human progress in every other science and every other business of life, but we make no allowance for the effect of mutations upon that science which is at once the most profound and variant of all. The principles of the law have grown from a few in the beginning to ever increasing multitudes to conform to the multiplying necessities of mankind, and there never has been a time when there has not been a call for reformation in the system of justice. The present call is unique only inasmuch as it is inspired with unreasonable censure of the courts and the legal profession. Unquestionably there is cause for complaint, but it should be lodged against our system of government under which legislative bodies meet every two years for the purpose of inflicting us with new and needless laws, many of which are enacted in deference to the wishes of crazy reformers and pestiferous demagogues. Two centuries ago it was said that the law was a bottomless pit. To describe it now after more than a century of activity on the part of American statesmen is beyond our power of imagination. Even in Lord Bacon's day he found that so great had been the accumulation of statutes and so intricate were they that the certainty of law was "entirely lost in the heap." Lord Bacon's was the profoundest brain that ever a wig covered. If he was bewildered in a maze of statutes when the Anglo-Saxon system of jurisprudence was young, should we not be inclined to make allowance for the uncertainties of the law that have resulted from persistent tinkering with the codes? Our reformers tell us that their main purpose is to secure equality before the law and accelerate the pace of justice. This of course is a most laudable design. To accomplish it will be to hasten the Millennium. A similar purpose has animated good men for centuries. Dean Swift pointed out the desirability of this consummation when he compared the law to cobwebs "which may catch small flies but let wasps and hornets break through." And we know that Shakespeare was sensible of the inequality of the law in his day, for is it not the immortal bard that speaks of a fish hanging in the net "like the poor man's right in the law." As to accelerating the pace of justice by extinguishing the law's delays nothing is more devoutly to be wished in civil matters, but let us not be too eager to hurry men to jail. We know that reformers of the present generation are more concerned about the law's delays in criminal than in civil cases, but this we regard as a matter of regret. Men who are thus minded are certainly unfamiliar with the history of law reform; nor is it likely that they are informed as to the history of the principles upon which individual liberty is safeguarded. For the purpose of enabling them to glimpse important truths we will call their attention to the following observations of Edmund Burke:

From the first records of human impatience down to the present time it has been complained that the march of violence and oppression is rapid, but that the progress of remedial and vindictive justice, even the divine, has almost always favored the appearance of being languid and sluggish. Something of this is owing to the very nature and constitution of human affairs; because as justice is a circumspect, cautious, scrutinizing, balancing principle, full of doubt even of itself, and fearful of doing wrong even to the greatest wrongdoers, in the nature of things its movements must be slow in comparison with the headlong rapidity with which avarice, ambition and revenge pounce down upon the devoted prey of those violent and destructive passions.

We are disposed to expostulate with those good men, especially with the zealous priests of the sacred temple of justice, who have consecrated themselves to the task of broadening the road to jail. What is vastly more needed in our opinion is a little more depth to human affection. It is the habit of men that vex society with their regenerative methods to exaggerate the importance of some special means of reform. This is the error into which they have fallen who would withdraw protection from the innocent to facilitate the punishment of the guilty. Let us reform the law, but let us remember that there can never be anything certain about it but expense.

Perspective Impressions

Judge Dunne has been pronounced a maniac. But unfortunately the pronunciamento is not official.

Our learned Supervisors have empowered the police to censorize the drama. And yet there are people who do not regard this as a cultured community!

Senator Aldrich says he is not coming West to teach but to learn. Why doesn't he go to school to La Follette, the one man in the country that knows everything worth knowing?

President Taft reminds us that we have much to be thankful for. Nothing gives some of us in this neck of the woods so much reason to be thankful as the utter discomfiture of others.

Public feeling is ever apt to side with anyone who is given the appearance of being persecuted. This truism has received fresh illustration in the case of the "Red Widow." But for illustration we of San Francisco do not have to go so far afield.

The chivalrous gents who prate about the unwritten law covering the case of women seduced under promise of marriage appear to be laboring under the delusion that a woman is occasionally to be found who will admit that she was seduced in some other way.

Mayor-elect McCarthy's salutatory to the people of San Francisco may be epitomized in the words of Solomon, "Let us crown ourselves with rosebuds before they be withered."

Tolstoi's Farewell Message to the World

(In this message, translated from the Russian for Town Talk, Count Tolstoi, who is now in his eighty-first year preaches once more the importance of love, a subject upon which he first expatiated in his famous treatise on Christianity entitled "My Religion," which was published a quarter of a century ago. Count Tolstoi has lived many years and seen many things. In his young manhood he was a soldier, and he was among the defenders of Sebastapol in the Crimean War. He saw life in city, camp and court. He lived the life of super-refined barbarism and excessive luxury characteristic of the Russian aristocracy. During that period, as he said himself, he believed in nothing. About the year 1880 his life and his desires underwent a great change. After the storm and stress of a life of dissipation in the rounds of Vanity Fair he turned back to the ideals of youth and innocence and sought to make them once more the objects of desire. His philosophy is the philosophy of the simple life. He looks forward to the golden age when men shall dwell together in the bonds of love, and sin and suffering shall be no more the common lot of mankind. By some he is regarded as a fanatic, but he is the idol of the Russian people and critics regard him as one of the foremost literary men of the age.—Editor's Note.)

In this my farewell message to the world I present my view as to how life should be conducted that henceforth it may be not as heretofore sad and bad, but as God wishes and as we ourselves wish, that is, full of happiness and tranquillity. The attainment of this end depends on the conception we form of the purpose of existence. If I conceive of life that my body (or the body of John, of Peter or of Mary) is given for the purpose of finding as much joy and fortune as possible, in that event life will be miserable and bad. The reason is that all desire the same thing, and as there is not enough to go round every man who lives for himself must struggle to take from others, with the result of making others unhappy. Moreover those who achieve their desires are not happy, since they are always tortured with anxiety lest others should deprive them of their wealth and filled with envy of others who have accumulated more than they.

All men whose life is in the body are unhappy. To attain happiness a man must understand that it is not to be reached through obedience to the body's dictates, but in obedience to the dictates of the spirit which desires spiritual happiness, and which, being the same in all men, wishes for the happiness of all.

Such is the constitution of the world that no man can live as his body demands. The spirit, the soul can always live happily because all that it demands is love, and to attain love no man has to fight with another. The more of love a man has, the nearer is he drawn to others. Why then do we not love? Each will be happy and contented in proportion to his love, and the more he loves the more will he make others happy and contented.

All holy and wise men and Christ himself, taught that our life is miserable through ourselves; that the Power which sent us into life, which Power we call God, did not send us that we might torture ourselves, but rather that we should attain the happiness which we all desire. They taught also that we fail to attain the desired happiness only when we misunderstand life, and do wrong.

We complain of life; we complain that it is ill ordered. We fail to understand that it is not our life which is ill ordered, but that the mistake is ours in doing what we ought not to do. We act as acts a drunkard who complains that there are too many drink-shops, forgetting that the drink-shops could not exist if there were no drunkards.

Life is given to us that it should be happy. It is our own business to make it happy. The way to make it a certain chain of unbroken happiness is to live in love and not in hatred.

We hear on all sides that life is bad and miserable because of its bad institutions; we need only, we are told, to change the bad institutions into good ones and life will change for the better. Do not believe that. Do not believe that any particular institution can make life either better or worse. Those people who most thirstily seek for the best institutions are often themselves living in discord and quarreling. The institution which some propose as the best others declare to be the worst; they desire to substitute their own ideals, which opponents agree to be very bad. And even if all institutions were the best conceivable, men could not live with them owing to their being used to a bad life. At present we are used to a bad life, and we are content with it. We pretend that we would live better amongst better institutions. But how can institutions be better while men remain bad?

Must men be made better? At present all they do is to promise you a good life if you, leading a bad life, fight with other men, overthrow them by force, and kill them in order to attain better conditions of life. That is, you are promised a better life if you become worse than you are. That is a delusion. There is only one way to attain a better life, and that is to become a better man.

Happiness, the happiness of yourself and of others, can never be based upon a fallible institution sustained by force, but only upon the health of the soul. Only through the soul can the individual or the community attain the greatest happiness. The true happiness which every human heart pants for lies not in institutions upheld by force. It can be attained at any moment of life, and even of death, by the path of love.

Such happiness was granted to us hundreds of years ago. Men, however, failed to understand it and did not grasp it. Now the time is come when we must accept it; firstly, because the folly and suffering of our lives have gone so far that our state is unbearable; secondly, the teaching of Christ has now become so plain that no man can fail to see it. We reach salvation only by realizing that our life does not rest in the body, but in the spirit of God which lives within us; that therefore all the efforts hitherto directed to the improvement of our bodily life must be directed to one single and essential work; that each must extend his love not only to those who love him, but, as Christ says, to all men, especially to those who are alienated from us, or hate us. Today our life is so far removed from that ideal that it seems impossible to transfer our interest from worldly things to the one essential and unaccustomed work of love.

This, however, is a delusion. To love all, even those who hate us, is really not so difficult as to hate all and fight with all. A change in our conception of life is not impossible; the real impossibility is to continue the fight of all against all in which we are now engaged. Only such a change can deliver men from the sufferings they now endure, and the change must therefore come sooner or later.

Why should we torture ourselves instead of remembering that the greatest happiness is destined for us? All depends upon ourselves. The path is easy and direct and brings nothing but happiness.

An objection is raised by those who suffer, by the poor and the oppressed. "That is all right," they say, "for the rich and the rulers of men. They have their enemies in their power and can afford to love them. For us, who suffer and are oppressed, that is another matter." That is not true. The rich and the rulers of men must change their conception of life with the poor and the oppressed. It is still easier for the poor than for the rich. The poor need do nothing that is against the command of love; they need take no part in deeds of violence. For the rich the gospel of love is harder to accept and follow. They must first resist the seduction brought by their power and wealth. That is not easy. The poor and the oppressed have no such obstacles to overcome.

The human race grows as the individual. It grows in the consciousness of love. In our age this consciousness has attained such clearness that it is plain that love

A Promise

By Leon Frapie (From the French)

Mlle. Nicolle, nurse in the hospitals, splendidly crowned with golden hair, a blonde with blue eyes and rosy cheeks, gave an earnest, angelic smile to the most repulsive patients.

It was her peerless charm which suggested to Professor Burget that famous theory: Beauty is a remedy.

And Mademoiselle Nicolle was selected to apply the "treatment by beauty" in the hospital most largely supplied with victims of accidents, crimes and brawls.

This was the idea. The injured men who are unconscious are supposed to have quitted life under frightful conditions. Very well! Their bodily and mental safety depends, quite often, upon the first impression, the first image meeting their eyes, when they revive. They are upon the extreme edge of an abyss—death or madness—the slightest shock may plunge them downward. If they return to their wretchedness, they fall; the feeble light which they still retain, flickers and goes out. This light must be fostered by some irresistible charm; there must be an eager, imperious longing for life.

Mademoiselle Nicolle, at the bedsides of the wounded, performed this special service of awaiting the returns to this world and presenting the fascinating refuge of her wonderful beauty.

She kept her place, leaning over the bed; at the first sign of revival it was not alone the beaming of her face which caressed the patient, it was also the divine music of her voice which welcomed him, and led him forward to hope and to security.

"Good day!"—Ah! What happiness!

No pain, no vague haunting could resist that charming, entrancing welcome into a new world.

And Mademoiselle Nicolle stayed until the patients were no longer a prey to their sufferings and their terrors. She imposed the soverignty of her radiant beauty and drove away the hostile fancies.

It had been her chance to leave her hand for twenty hours in that of an unhappy victim of hallucinations, who went to pieces whenever she tried to withdraw; all the same she had conquered the phantoms!

This was her first interview with Bibi, called "The Stump," aged thirteen.

Bibi was born and had grown up in the jungle forming, for a vast space, the outer zone of Paris.

Imperative circumstances had prevented his parents from fondling his childhood for any length of time. Oh! horribly imperative circumstances!

An orphan at four years old, the hands of strangers had at once measured out to him work, blows and bread in equally derisive proportions.

His education was strictly limited to a profound knowledge of blows, of cold and of hunger in their causes and effects. He was ignorant of beauty and goodness to the extent of never having seen either a really kind face or the inside of what could be called a house; and there was in him a mixture of rudimentary and absurd ideas upon all subjects, even the most ordinary.

He had tried several times to cross the barrier giving entrance into Paris, but he had always, from notions of modesty, quickly turned back again. The most jaded, the busiest of Parisians, would have observed Bibi with wonder, even those who had made campaigns, who had seen several international expositions, even those who would have had no curiosity in regard to a railroad wreck or a fire.

In truth, Bibi had never owned a pair of trousers with two entire legs, nor had he even been able to bring together at one time his entire face; he always lacked some little piece—a cheek, an eyebrow, an ear. But, nevertheless, he maintained a certain dignity, capable, by itself alone, of drawing general attention to him. He looked serious, and one felt, with uneasiness, that the power to laugh had been taken from him forever.

Upon an icy All Saints' Day, when the fatal idea of cooking potatoes under burning paper and rags had germinated in some urchins' heads, Bibi, called "The Stump," aided by three confederates, undertook a raid upon a market-gardener's field.

The young marauders were surprised in the course of their criminal attempt, and Bibi, called "The Stump," received such a shower of blows from a hoppole, that he stayed upon the ground.

At the hospital he did not regain consciousness until the end of forty-eight hours.

It was three o'clock in the morning; a deep silence prevailed in the white and shining room with its high arches and tiled walls.

Bibi, suddenly restored to life, perceived the vast space, peaceful, bright, and a delightful, smiling face, and the music of an adorable voice.

"Good day, my dear!"

At the same time he remembered his enemies with whom he had been engaged. He tried in vain to move his head: his eyes turned about like balls of lead; as to his limbs, he did not attempt to stir them; the blows had taken from him all bodily sensation.

Then, in the presence of the rapture offered to his eyes and his ears, which corresponded to nothing in his former experience, he had no longer any doubt:

"I have been knocked out—this is how it is when a fellow is dead!"

But he was seized at once by the fear that he might find he had made his way by mistake into that good region of the kingdom of the dead. He knew himself; he must have forced his way in. And he recalled an occasion when, upon earth, he had slipped upon the flat of his stomach under the canvas of a foreign circus.

He set himself to watch the Angel, to see whether she had not a suspicious air. No, the caressing music continued.

"Good day, my dear!"

Mademoiselle Nicolle smiled upon Bibi with all her beauty, upon his crushed nose, his torn ears, his scalped head, his bruised chin.

"Ah, ah!" she said to herself, "there is a strange anxiety in these eyes. Quick! Let us drive away the specters!"

"Well, my dear, here we are in the good place of quietness. No more trouble here, no more fright; no one theatens us, no one is looking for us. We are far away from all worry. The things of old times have gone, are ended; everything is new for us."

She thought she noticed that his eyes were impressed by the loneliness, the great size of the room.

"But we will not stay here all alone, my dear; we will go with the others, with a great many others—that will be more gay."

"Alas!" thought Bibi, "there it is! I've been found out!"

According to his size he could have his choice whether he would be placed in a ward for children or in a ward for adults. Mademoiselle Nicolle added:

"Which do you prefer, my dear, to go with the big folks or with the little ones?"

The Angel, with her ineffable sweetness, all at once inspired in Bibi an immense need of affection—a desire unknown to him, never before experienced.

Ah, well! Since he was to be removed, since he could not stay in that privileged region, oh, in mercy let him be sent where he would have a family! This was such an ardent longing that it contrived to write itself upon his marred features.

"With the big folks or with the little ones?" the charming voice repeated.

But Bibi would not answer before making sure of his good fortune; he was too anxious. Oh, in mercy let him be sent where he would be among kinsfolk! And, with his eyes fixed upon the Angel's, he deliberately made his conditions beforehand, after the manner of wilful children.

Mademoiselle Nicolle guessed, indeed, that he had some personal wish, and her celestial smile beamed upon him, promising the future in all generosity.

Then, being quite sure that the Angel had given her promise without any mistake, "Bibi, called "The Stump," who had never had an opportunity to give a caress, gave his first evidence of affection:

"I want to go with the folks who have been guillotined!"

Paladino, Lombroso and Spiritism

With Some Reasons for Regarding "After Death—What?" as an Unsatisfactory Book and Madame Paladino as a Very Suspicious Character in the Cloudy Realm of Psychic Phenomena

By Robert McTavish

"After Death—What?" That is the fascinating title of the last book which Professor Cesare Lombroso published before death came to give him, as it gives every man, the only satisfactory answer to the paramount question. Lombroso's last book is inherently interesting, as are all of his contributions to scientific truth or hypothesis, but "After Death—What?" derives an adventitious interest just now from the fact that the spiritistic medium to whom so many of its pages are devoted has recently arrived in the United States. Madame Eusapia Paladino, the celebrated Neapolitan medium, has been called to the attention of all Americans by the stories of the remarkable seances which she gave aboard the steamer on her way to this country and by the formation of a committee of scientists and prestidigitateurs to investigate the weird manifestations with which she is credited. Accounts of these things have been published in all the newspapers and they cannot have failed to excite the curiosity of all who long to pierce the veil which separates the natural from the supernatural, to cross the bridge which spans the void between this world and the next or who are eager to satisfy themselves that there are supernatural forces and that there is a next world. Sleight-of-hand performances are very interesting and amusing, but if everybody believed that spiritistic mediums were merely slight-of-hand performers there would be no religious cult of spiritism, any more than there is a religious cult of tumbling or xylophone playing. It is because the work of the medium has been invested with the sacredness which characterizes the relations existing, for instance, between a living son and his dead mother that spiritism has now hundreds of thousands of followers.

"After Death—What?" was the last publication of a scientist whose attitude toward the great problem of religion—a future life—had for many years been that of the agnostic. For many years Professor Lombroso held that the evidence adduced in proof of the existence of a state of consciousness after death was scientifically inconclusive. But a change in his attitude began when he first commenced the serious study of the spiritistic manifestations of Madame Eusapia Paladino. Finally he accepted spiritism, announced his belief in a future state and even announced, before his death, that he would endeavor to send communications from the next world to this. "After Death—What?" was written to explain and justify his change of front. On this account and because the remarkable personage with whom it is largely concerned is now in this country, it is worthy of study. But I think the serious student will be greatly disappointed with it. If I mistake not, he will marvel that the spiritistic manifestations of Madame Paladino could have impressed Professor Lombroso so deeply as to work a change in his attitude toward one of the problems of eschatology. I am far from being an agnostic myself but it seems to me almost pitiful that a scientist of the world-wide celebrity of Professor Lombroso should be delivered from agnosticism by the dubious showings of a Paladino. If I were inclined to moralize—a very unscientific habit—I should say that here was a man who went so long without some sort of faith that in his closing years, when the hunger for belief became imperative, he allowed his appetite to be appeased with a very gruelly dilution indeed. But in place of moralizing it will be more to the purpose to say something about Madame Eusapia Paladino, about Lombroso and about the general subject of spiritism.

From the time when Eusapia Paladino was a little girl she had manifestations, either mediumistic or hallucinatory—such as hearing raps on pieces of furniture on which she was leaning, having her clothes or the bed-covers stripped from her at night and seeing ghosts or apparitions. Various well-known mediums heard of her and investigated her manifestations with the result that she devoted herself to spiritism as a means of gain. From the outset her mediumship was almost wholly confined to the production of the physical phenomena of spiritism—raps, knockings, movement of tables and chairs, materialization of phantasmal forms and so forth and she was at first regarded as an inferior medium. But as time passed her mediumistic powers increased. Besides such comparatively commonplace marvels as the levitation of a table apparently without human assistance, the movement of trumpets and other small objects through the air, and mysterious pinchings and blows administered to the sitters by an unseen hand, she performed feats seldom equalled by any other medium. Thus, if the reports of the investigators are to be believed, she more than once, while seated motionless in a chair on the platform of a weighing machine, caused the indicator to register remarkable difference in weight, as though it were possible for her to grow heavier or lighter at pleasure. On two occasions she was lifted bodily from the floor by an invisible force, and deposited, still seated in her chair, on the top of a table. Here is Lombroso's account of a still stranger manifestation: "We placed upon the table a large cardboard smeared with phosphorescent material and placed other pieces of the same cardboard in other parts of the room. In this way we clearly saw the dark silhouette of a hand projected on the cardboard upon the table, and upon the background formed by the other pieces we saw the black outline of the hand pass and repass around us." Here is another of the phenomena which impressed Lombroso: "A big table weighing about twenty-four and one-half pounds situated in the empty recess in front of the window, and upon which someone had laid boxes of photographic glass plates and a metronome belonging to Professor Morselli, moved forward to us, then retired. The metronome got into action and began its regular tic-tac.

The Unwritten Law

Apropos of Alma Bell, what in the name of the Old Harry is the unwritten law anyway? Thaw's is a threadbare and another story. What in this case is it? Is it in any case this, that the committing of one lawless act by woman justifies her in committing a second and worse—the unlawful taking of life? But may not a woman protect her honor? shoot in better-self defense? After the white horse is stolen? Automatic modesty, my word for it, affords more effective protection to womanhood than the most murderous revolver ever invented. Murder is no more retroactive than marriage. Moreover, in these affairs-de-coeur, too much is often taken for granted. That the man in the case is invariably to blame is a pretty fiction for family reading, inspired by the double standard of morality so bitterly inveighed against nowadays by male and female old maids alike. Alma Bell's lover is dead and buried, and cannot defend himself, so dead that any one—no matter of how little Latin—may speak evil of him at will. With him are buried the facts of the case, whatever good he did or was interred with his bones. Those facts no living jury will ever hear. Exhumed, his wound's mouth would scarce testify in the dead man's behalf. 'Twould of a truth do its duty and be dumb. As is abundantly proved by the attitude of England's king towards the Lady Cardigan Memoirs, ill-recollected, it is a royal precept that, if a private person behave like a prince, he should at least have the common decency to suppress the fact, to perjure himself like a gentleman. Dead or alive, silence is man's only self-defense. Speech is veritable dross, and though whitest truth bound to be branded as counterfeit and lead. Many a husband successfully sued for divorce on trivial grounds could, if he would, have brought successful counter-suit on statutory grounds, but gallantly preferred to let the case against him go by default. As the world and his wife well know, but see fit to keep the knowledge to themselves, the cardinal sin here in question is more equally shared between the sexes than the "betrayed" would have judge and jury believe. The Eves of today, even though they are not readers of The Ladies Home Journal, eat of the tree understandingly. Woman's coldness may be, often is, a form of courtship. Man is in honor bound to make-believe that it is not. Any twelve of his peers would hang a man for proving otherwise—and serve him right! So say we all of us! He's a cad and broke the rules of the game to save his moral neck. But truth murdered will out.

Some Pertinent Questions

The facts of the case, ladies and gentlemen, the facts of the case! Alma Bell shot her faithless lover—let us hope—through the heart. Did he discard his? God only knows. If men be who know, they are all honorable and would not tell for the world. Should the murdered man rise from the dead to say he did—instead of "Freely I forgive you!"—would he have the ghost of a chance of thereby redeeming himself, of being believed in open court, even? Were I dictator, would I hang Alma Bell? Were I woman, would I murder the man I could not longer make live for me alone? Twice no! I deem life adequate punishment for your Alma Bells, and death a too easy way out of it for your Alma Bells' defective lovers. Had her lover married Alma Bell according to promise, would that have changed one whit the dead facts of the case? her moral status in the irrevocable past? Let me repeat—truth unrepeated falls to earth—written law nor unwritten is retroactive. Lost character is irrecoverable by law. Chastity is a veritable Humpty-Dumpty—so far, that is, as changing what has been is concerned. Alma Bell's case is not unique. Else has Nature once more imitated Art. The difference between poetic justice and prosaic is beautifully set forth in a poem by the less prosaic half of the Brownings. The revenge of the spinner, how infinitely sweeter! But judge for yourself. Read

A Year's Spinning

He listened at the porch that day,
To hear the wheel go on, and on:
And then it stopped—ran back a way—
While through the door he brought the sun.
But now my spinning is all done.

He sate beside me, with an oath
That love ne'er ended, once begun.
I smiled—believing for us both,
What was the truth for only one.
And now my spinning is all done.

My mother cursed me that I heard
A young man's wooing as I spun.
Thanks, cruel mother, for that word,—
For I have since a harder known:
And now my spinning is all done.

I thought—O God!—my first-born's cry
Both voices to mine ear would drown.
I listened in mine agony—
It was the "silence" made me groan!
And now my spinning is all done.

Bury me 'twixt my mother's grave
(Who cursed me on her death-bed lone),
And my dead baby's (God it save!),
Who, not to bless me, would not moan.
And now my spinning is all done.

A stone upon my heart and head,
But no name written on the stone!
Sweet neighbors, whisper low instead,
"This sinner was a loving one—
And now her spinning is all done."

And let the door ajar remain,
In case he should pass by anon;
And leave the wheel out very plain—
That "he," when passing in the sun,
May see the spinning is all done.

As to me, I would see Alma Bell die, not of hate and hemp, but of love and a broken heart, and her lover, looking in at the open door, seeing the wheel very plain, and things as they might have been well as tears would let him, live to realize how that the spinning was all done. And now my yarn, too, is all spun. There remains for me but to match a harsh deed of real life with harsh unimaginative verse, namely:

Public Opinion

A sorry conscience hath the crowd:
It crieth: "Who's to blame?"
When Scarlet's self is O so loud
That it's a crying shame.

O Alma Bell, live to see many "foolish sunsets," learn how ill prosaic life imitates poetic art!

Hearst and Scab Labor

I am told that there is trouble brewing for William R. Hearst because the sand teamsters employed in the lot at Third and Market streets are not union men. My authority for this added that the matter had been referred to the Building Trades Council and that it is possible that the work may be tied up with a boycott unless union men are substituted for the scab laborers. If this prove so, I will not be stricken with amazement, for I am casehardened when it comes to inconsistencies between the Hearst preachments and the Hearst practices. Hearst has found it most advantageous to pose as the champion of unionism but it does not follow that he is wholeheartedly committed to the cause of the organized workman. The eccentric editor has let it be known for years that he regards the scab as the frumious bandersnatch of modern life but it is rash to conclude that he would hesitate to employ scabs on that account. But I do think that Hearst will use every means in his power to prevent a boycott of his building operations, for that would be a poor advertisement for a newspaper which he would like to see in every workingman's home.

Johnson the Wizard

As time runs on, now that the atmosphere has been clarified and the forces of virtue are disintegrating, a white light will be shed on the dark background that until recently was animated with the doings of our late, unlamented uplifters, and we shall be able to glimpse in the making some of the history which has yet to become an open book. One of the most interesting chapters of this history deals with the highly profitable activities of one Hiram Johnson, an attorney who distinguished himself by his vociferations in the recent campaign. He went about bestowing the largess of his esteem in terms encomiastic on the Hon. Francis J. Heney and the Hon. William Langdon, commending them for their honesty and fearlessness, and warmly certifying to the exceptional qualities of heart and head that entitle them to the fealty of the people. Mr. Johnson was absurdly intemperate at times, but if we examine into the matter of his relations with the office of the District Attorney we shall find that it was probably the noble sentiment of gratitude that inspired him in the dizziest flights of his cart-tail oratory. The fact is that there is no man in San Francisco that has more reason to lament what happened on election day than Hiram Johnson. With the District Attorney's office in the hands of his indulgent friends Mr. Johnson is a wizard in the practice of criminal law, a veritable master in the mysterious art of hocus-pocus which some eminent authorities tell us is next of kin to legerdermain and necromancy. Moreover, with "Bill" Langdon on the job care was taken that Mr. Johnson's light should be never hidden under a bushel. Indeed so great has grown the candle power of that light under the fostering ministrations of friends in office that it has been seen afar by men entangled in the meshes of the law, and they have loved to bask in it and Mr. Johnson loved them so to do.

First, the Brown Case

With the case of Dalzell Brown, which was deftly handled by Mr. Johnson, we are all more or less familiar; but there are others which have been silhouetted in the limelight for public inspection. Dalzell Brown was arrested for wrecking a bank. Not until his arrest had he ever had any relations with Mr. Johnson, but between the bars of his cell he saw the Johnson light gleaming an alluring gleam in the distance. He summoned Mr. Johnson, and about that time the graft prosecutor withdrew temporarily from the graft prosecution to give his attention to the case of the man who had wrecked a bank. Presto! the prosecutor was metamorphosed into a defender, and with such clairvoyant skill did he exercise his persuasive powers in the haunts of his friends that all at once it dawned upon a bunch of the most inveterate moralists that ever scourged the wicked that the bank wrecker was perhaps not so black as he had been painted; that, indeed, his particular case called for the divine attribute of mercy. Mr. Brown, it was explained, to assuage the fury of the prisoner's victims, had valuable information which he was prepared to give to the receiver of the defunct bank, but which that gentleman has never received. Brown received a nominal punishment, Johnson his fee, and the District Attorney nothing more than the approval of his conscience. Briefly I have given the history of the Brown case, but as I have said there are others.

Some Unwritten History

Let us inquire into the case of Knoblock and Grossman, serving to illustrate as it does the advantage to an attorney of having an ignorant friend in a juridicial office. After a preliminary examination in the police court, held in March, 1907, Knoblock and Grossman were held to answer upon a felony charge. Hiram Johnson as their attorney applied to Judge Murasky for a writ of habeas corpus. The application was denied. Hiram Johnson then made application to another judge by whom it was granted, and who has since been ranked by Mr. Johnson with Mr. Heney and Mr. Langdon as among the most honest and most fearless men in San Francisco. The judge who issued the writ of habeas corpus did not hold that the evidence failed to show the commission of the felony charged, but for other reasons he set the prisoners at liberty. The next step in the case was taken by the firm of Campbell, Metson & Drew. This firm sent a letter to District Attorney Langdon during a session of the grand jury in 1908, enclosing a transcript of all the testimony taken upon the preliminary examination and calling his attention to the fact that the opinion of the court in the habeas corpus proceedings did not hold that the evidence was insufficient. Furthermore Mr. Langdon was informed that two of his assistants who participated in the preliminary examination of Knoblock and Grossman and also in the habeas corpus proceedings, had expressed the opinion that the crime had been clearly established by the evidence. The good and true Mr. Langdon, however, refused to present the matter to the grand jury which was then in session.

The Stubbornness of "Muley Bill"

Notwithstanding the apparent reluctance of the District Attorney to pursue with his accustomed zeal the clients of his sponsor and panegryrist, Campbell, Metson & Drew were not discouraged by his strange and exceptional apathy. They drew up a synopsis of the history of the case, and presented it to Alonzo G. McFarland, the foreman of the grand jury with a list of witnesses and a request that testimony be taken. This was done and another indictment was promptly returned against Knoblock and Grossman. On the day on which the testimony was taken before the grand jury the firm of Campbell, Metson & Drew sent a letter to Deputy District Attorney Robert Harrison, courteously suggesting that in the event of the jury voting for an indictment they should be glad to share the responsibility of drawing that instrument. As all the facts of the case were well known to the firm they believed, and so informed Mr. Harrison, that they might be of assistance in the matter. No response was made to this letter. Hiram Johnson again appeared for the defendants and demurred to the indictment on the ground that it was fatally defective. Meanwhile Campbell, Metson & Drew, having examined the indictment, and found that it was fatally defective, called Mr. Langdon's attention to the matter and to the fact that they had offered to assist in framing a proper indictment, at the same time pointing out specifically the most glaring defects. They said, among other things, "We take it that from the above you can arrive at but one conclusion, that the indictment is insufficient and doubtless would be so held without the persuasive powers of an attorney of the accomplishments of Mr. Johnson, to whom the insufficiency of the indictment is plainly apparent as will appear by reference to the demurrer filed by him." This was not all. The attorneys advised Mr. Langdon that he should confess the insufficiency of the indictment and obtain from the court a proper order for the resubmission of the matter to the grand jury as the law provides. "We beg," they said, "to call your attention to section 1008 of the Penal Code to the effect that the allowance of a demurrer to an information or indictment is a bar to another prosecution for the same offense, unless the court, being of the opinion that the objection may be avoided by a new indictment or information, directs the cause to be submitted to the same or another grand jury." Did this letter arouse "Muley Bill" from a lethargy that almost seemed to be inspired? Not at all. Nor does the history of the case end here.

Juggled to a Finish

"The fearless and honest" one, as Mr. Hiram Johnson loves to describe the ineffable Langdon, deigned not to pay the slightest attention to the courteous admonitions with which he had been favored. In the course of time Mr. Johnson's demurrer came up for argument before Judge Conley of Madera, sitting here in San Francisco, and was overruled. Months elapsed, when, after the disbanding of the grand jury, so that it would be impossible to have the matter referred to it again, Hiram Johnson asked and obtained leave to reopen the hearing of his demurrer. The motion was granted and the demurrer was promptly sustained at a time when no grand jury was in session. Instead, then, of resubmitting the matter to the next grand jury, which was the last opportunity open to District Attorney Langdon to secure a valid indictment, he appealed from the order sustaining the demurrer, notwithstanding that he had been well advised that the indictment was radically defective and that the appeal could accomplish no result but an affirmance. The matter was thus in abeyance until the decision of the District Court of Appeal rendered on the 17th day of September of this year. By the decision of that court the order sustaining the demurrer was affirmed. But, as though this were not sufficient, it is shown by the decision that the appeal was, either through the ignorance or guilelessness of Mr. Langdon, so defectively presented that it was impossible for the Court of Appeal to consider the question upon its merits. That court said: "We are, therefore, obliged to affirm the order and judgment appealed from for want of any 'legal' record from which we can determine whether or not the court erred in its rulings." Thus ends the story. Is it not to be inferred therefrom that there are more ways than one of obtaining immunity for men charged with crime? And does the story not make it clear that Mr. Johnson was sincere in his campaign appreciations of Mr. Langdon?

Lionel Josaphare's New Book

I wonder how many of my readers remember two volumes of poetry, "The Lion at the Well" and "Turquoise and Iron" which Robertson published for Lionel Josaphare a few years before the fire. Both books are now out of print and difficult to find; lucky indeed are those who chance to have copies of them. From cover to cover they are crammed with the stuff of pure inspiration, verses set to no other minstrel's music, but alilt with the harmonies of a truly poetical and most original mind. It has always been a matter of regret with me that Josaphare has not published more of his poetry, for of course he has not stopped writing it—he could no more refrain from the metrical expression of his personality than the nightingale from singing in the moonlight. Quite casually at times he has picked a poem from a mass of papers in his breast-pocket and has overwhelmed me with it and always it has been a poem which all the world of poetry-lovers ought to be made acquainted with. In due course, I suppose, he will gather some of these brilliants together and give them to the public. Meanwhile his pen is intermittently busy with prose. Just now he is to the fore with a little book called "The World of Suckers," one hundred pages of pungent satire. It is published by the Danner Publishing Company at 1508 Polk street. I am sorry it has not the imprint of A. M. Robertson or Paul Elder; either would have given it a better dress and would have done more careful printing.

"The World of Suckers"

But after all the outward seeming of a little volume like this is of small consequence; the content is all and within the pages of "The World of Suckers" is a wealth of satirical humor which will hold the proper sort of reader in thrall from the first page to the last. Enthusiasts will hail Josaphare as a new observer, come to lash the foibles of our day and generation and without doubt they will be right. Only those of us who know Josaphare intimately will not be surprised at the excellencies of his latest volume. In fugitive pieces hidden away in inconsequential and impermanent periodicals he has done this sort of thing before, but this is a sustained effort, the fruit of his ripest thought and his carefully co-ordinated experiences. It behooves us therefore to break away from the attitude of facile acceptance that so often injures the chances of a writer among his friends and to rise up and proclaim that here is an exceptional performance by an exceptional man, a pregnant utterance of truths too often slurred and hidden but which are now set forth with daring yet accuracy, with humor unmixed with malice. That "The World of Suckers" is many steps in advance of all the other prose compositions of Josaphare I am quite certain; there is no mere word artistry, no ebullitions calculated simply to shock; it shows the conservatism of maturity, the genial sympathy for human weakness which comes when sober reason sits in judgment on hot experience.

The Plan of the Book

"The World of Suckers" is too good to be ticketed and pigeonholed, but if it be understood that I am not disparaging its originality, I will say here that it belongs to that fascinating category which includes Shaftesbury's Characteristics, Butler's Characters, and Thackeray's Book of Snobs. The underlying principle of the volume is expressed in the preface from which I will pick a few sentences: "Men judge their acts by a standard of good and evil. Yet the steam of their emotions is not consciously a product of either. . . . Herein I am concerned with what man does, not what he thinks he does nor what he piously ought to do. . . . I watch the pageant of external things, called Progress. . . . Progress is an improved system adapted to an increased number, giving the minority an easier control of the majority and the places which the majority inhabit." That progress is built on what he calls Suckerdom, Josaphare next shows as follows: "In order that civilization progress and partake of poetic grandeur continuously or now and then, there must be, ready and willing at all times, a predominance of joyful and high-spirited fools. Make no mistake; these are not fools of the brain, but fools of the world. In themselves they are good, law-abiding, tax-paying, intelligent men; virtuous or avaricious, as they are wanted."

An Example of a Sucker

In order that some idea may be given of the manner in which Josaphare illustrates his subject, I will quote

THE LATE PRINCE ITO AND HIS FAMILY

The great Japanese statesman who was assassinated in Harbin left a charming wife and two young children to mourn his loss.

what he considers a characteristic bit of suckerdom: "A hero or a high official or a foreign dignitary is expected on a visit to a large city. A few talkative citizens will greet him and ask him to predict a wonderful future for their city, or their climate, or their life insurance companies, their women or their presidential candidate. They wish to do this at a banquet that will burst the bladder of good cheer. How do they proceed? Meet and pool the expenses? No indeed. They mobilize themselves into a committee and inform the newspapers that accommodations will hardly be had for those who would like to attend. Then they send out invitations to a select few, that are to enter free, and to about 500 suckers, who are to respond with $20 each for the honor of the dinner; and until the date thereof, the suckers go about with an R. S. V. P. smile that is unmistakable. Here is $10,000 in the hands of the committee; and their first act is to draw on said amount their expenses for a prior dinner, at which they test the vintages of the coming testimonial, debate the arrangements, pound the table with their fistfuls of opinion, calculate the cost of the entertainment, hire a flock of musicians, set aside appropriations for the florist and the hotel-man, and see that none of the surplus falls through a crack in the floor. One concession is made to the vanity of the suckers, and that is recording the entertainment with a flashlight picture. Of course, the camera is focussed at the committee and the guest of honor. At each side of their perfect composure, the picture will show about two hundred faces lopsided in one direction and two hundred sloped in the other. . . . At the Flashlight Dinner, the suckers will get about $7 worth of food and wine for their twenty-dollar piece, and are placed where they must strain and contort every little while to observe how the guest of honor is getting along. . . . Without these suckers what would become of our civic pride? What would the people of other cities blab if a metropolis could not muster five hundred of its metropolitans to metropolate each with $20?"

Some Josaphareisms

I would like to quote Josaphare's delicious description of Paterfamilias, but you will have to read the whole book and I must not spoil your first taste of it. I will cull a sentence here and there, just to whet your appetite. "The largest gold mine ever discovered is suckerdom. Suckers average more gold per ton and yield more consistently than any hill of ore. Besides, the same old machinery can be used to smelt them." "Voters are essential to the peace of the country, so that they may blame themselves, and not their rulers for mismanagement." "The politician is a dual personality with a lily in his hand and a tapeworm in his ambition. Half of his life is spent in explaining and concealing the other half." Speaking of political meetings—"Wherever there is incidental music there is fraud and all the rest of the performance is music in disguise." "The ordinary man thinks that by going to the polls he is doing his duty as a citizen. But it is then too late. On election day he can merely do his duty as a sucker." "The Newthoughter prays to himself, and considers his prayer granted by taking it for granted that he already possessed everything by divine right." "There is no such thing as loving wisely. Wisdom does not love. We know things for what they are, and love them for what we wish them to be." "A woman with one-fourth the income of a man is wealthier than he, for her pleasures cost her nothing. She keeps herself alive to be amused by others. In order to have pleasure, all that a woman need do is to resist gently. There is no better established rule than that a woman should not pay her own way. That is why she is so fond of having it."

"Will you please give me a dime?" said a tramp. "I am blind."

"You can see out of one eye as well as I can," replied the gentleman importuned. "You are only half blind."

"Then give me half a dime," said the tramp.

The Bulletin's Friend

Judge Maurice T. Dooling of Hollister is entitled to the commiseration of his friends for two reasons: First, because of the substance of the address which he delivered at the Bar Association's symposium last week; secondly, because his address was published verbatim and exclusively by the Boughten Bulletin and garnished with his counterfeit presentment. I will explain. The burden of Judge Dooling's address was that lawyers who teach their clients how to evade the law are responsible for most of the defects of the system of justice. Now Judge Dooling is the man who came to San Francisco some months ago at the request of his friend Judge Dunne, the intimate friend and social crony of the Bulletin's editor, to preside at the trial of a case that was contrived for the purpose of enabling that unsavory journalist to evade the law of libel. It was notorious that the case was one of collusion. Indeed on the trial the complaining witness admitted that his motive was not to secure the conviction of the defendant, and that the only feeling of hostility which he nourished was against the man who had been injured. This man had caused the arrest of the Bulletin's editor in Bakersfield where he (the complainant) resides, and the defendant has been availing himself of every accessible technicality of the law to avoid the issue in that county because, as it happens, there is no puppet of his on the bench in that section of the State. Obviously the proceedings before Judge Dooling against the editor of the Bulletin had been instituted at the instance of the defendant, but notwithstanding the ugly disclosures made in open court Judge Dooling conceived it to be no violation of the proprieties, no mockery of justice, no reflection on the purity of the bench for him to lend his countenance to the scandalous frameup. Now in view of these facts is it not unfortunate for Judge Dooling that the Boughten Bulletin should have published his address in full and favored its readers with a half-tone reproduction of one of his most impressive photographs? Aside from the fact that the address, cognizant as we are of what has happened, exposes Judge Dooling to the suspicion of being woefully indifferent to the symmetry that ought to characterize the relations between practice and profession, the circumstance of the Bulletin's signal appreciation of his importance as a moralist, is, to say the least, not to his advantage. For though the Bulletin may have a keener sense of the virtues of an upright judge than any other paper, its manifestation of appreciation in this instance is likely to be confounded with partial payment on a debt of gratitude.

An Idealist of the Bench

Because Judge Dooling has not practiced what he preaches it does not follow that he is at all insincere. Judge Dooling is an idealist. Now idealists do not always claim for themselves the merits of the badge which they assume for preaching purposes. The insincere idealist, or in other words, the hypocrite, is one who preaches what he does not believe. Judge Dooling preached a good deal of nonsense at the Bar Association symposium, but doubtless he believes in it, for he is a rather unsophisticated individual, who has been misled by the undiscriminating admiration of innumerable grand and splendiferous parlors of native sons and indigenous daughters. In all his sophomoric lucubrations that give off the suffocating odors of the midnight lamp he exhibits an earnest mind struggling upwards through the region of clouds and storms to an untroubled summit where the noblest sympathies and highest aspirations dwell in serene and tranquil harmony. His sermon to the lawyers was characteristic; it was noddifying. It was idealism in a spasm of ecstasy. For example he said that what brings the law into disrepute is the practice of lawyers of trying to obtain something from the law for their clients to which their clients are not entitled, and that they should not do this; when the client is in the wrong the lawyer should always tell him so, and advise him to be just. What a delightful state of affairs would be brought about were all lawyers to follow Judge Dooling's salutary advice! The end of litigation would soon be in sight, and Judge Dooling would have to go to work on the farm. But is it not evident from this idealistic sentiment that Judge Dooling has yet to realize that life in all its phases is a compromise between common sense and the ideal, the one abating nothing of its aspirations, the other adapting itself to what is practicable and inevitable?

"Leading Lights" and Others

According to Judge Dooling it is the "leading lights" of the legal profession who devise methods to evade the law. This unsophisticated jurist doubtless believes all that he reads in the yellow journals and muckraking magazines. At all events he is not in touch with his profession, spending most of his time as he does in the rural districts. He has probably never heard of the lawyers who are known as "ambulance-chasers" and "half-a-leg" practitioners, the thrifty gentlemen who handle almost exclusively the cases of persons injured in railroad accidents. They are called "ambulance-chasers" because they employ agents to follow injured persons to the hospital. They are called "half-a-leg" practitioners because when a man loses a leg they bargain for half the sum recovered for damages. These lawyers are not among the leading lights of the profession, but many of them have no hesitation in evading the law. The methods of many of them are the methods of blackmailers. If we were to inquire as to what Judge Dooling regarded as evasions of the law we should probably learn that he has not in mind the practices of pettifoggers such as I have described, for these men are generally to be found among the reformers of the bar. It is to their interest to appeal to the sympathies of the mob in the interest of persons who are intent upon extorting money from public service corporations, and they sometimes have the sympathy of the demagogues of the bench. Judge Dooling probably regards as evasions of the law all proceedings instituted to test the constitutionality of acts of the legislature designed by demagogues to harass corporations and coddle a gullible constituency. Judge Dooling is not the only judge who has lost sight of the fact that the constitution is the law of the land and that it is more expressive of the deliberate will of the people than many statutes enacted in furtherance of the political ambition of job chasers.

Frank Short's Paper

One of the papers read at the Bar Association symposium was entirely free from balderdash and buncombe. It was not in the nature of an effusion. It was a plain matter-of-fact exposition of the weaknesses of our judicial system and their causes, and it was mostly unadorned common sense. This paper was not printed in the Boughten Bulletin, the editor of which is under no obligation to the author, Frank Short, of Fresno, a gentleman whose ability has enabled him to take rank among the "leading lights" of the profession. According to Mr. Short it is not the courts or the lawyers that are to blame for the inefficiency of our system of justice, but the people themselves who are incessantly tinkering with constitutions and statutes and burying the courts and profession beneath a wilderness of constitutional provisions, limitations, restrictions and commands, legislative enactments, prohibitions and declarations of such prolixity and number that the wonder of it all is that the judicial system survives at all.

Public Clamor and the Press

With reference to the subject of juries Mr. Short says: "The difficulty lies at the root of American society and the methods of conducting our newspapers and shaping and using public opinion in America." On this subject the distinguished Fresno attorney made some interesting and instructive observations which might be pondered to advantage by certain local members of the bar who have been making a good deal of noise of late. He said: "No thoughtful person will claim that any criminal case ought to be tried by a jury prejudiced in advance, either for or against the defendant. If such prejudiced jury is to be allowed, would you have it all unfavorable to the defendant, or all in his favor, or would you have it divided so that you would be sure to have a hung jurywhen we were through? And yet, in a certain class of cases in this country, is it fairly possible to select an impartial jury? To illustrate what I mean, suppose a number of criminal offenses are charged; suppose these offenses relate to subjects and matters of public interest and affect the general welfare; suppose the conviction or acquittal of the accused tends upon the one hand to advance the interests of one element, and to greatly prejudice the interests of another; what happens in the average American community? The press, leading the onslaught of eager followers, divides upon the one side and the other of the controversy. Both in the papers and on the streets and in public places and in assemblies called for that purpose the accused are tried; and in some of the papers, and with some of the people, and in some of the meetings, are overwhelmingly if not unanimously convicted. In other papers and by other people, and in other meetings, they are overwhelmingly if not unanimously acquited. This process of determining in advance the guilt or innocence of the accused goes on until anybody in the community who has not formed, expressed and openly declared his position, is described as a 'spineless mollycoddle' or a 'hopeless jellyfish,' or a 'bad citizen.' Before the court can begin the process of impanelling a so-called fair and impartial jury, the entire available citizenship of the community (barring only the mollycoddles and jellyfish aforesaid), are publicly enlisted in well organized, well drilled and well officered armies, sworn in advance to do their duty like good soldiers of the common weal. Is it any wonder that under such staggering and hopeless conditions the court and the process of the law are practically paralzyed? Or that the administration of justice becomes hopeless? And that it becomes not only impossible to select an intelligent and impartial jury, but practically impossible to secure a jury at all; and also impossible to convict even guilty defendants, and almost impossible to acquit even innocent ones? The process of creating a public sentiment against crime and criminals and in favor of honesty in government and the enforcement of the law is wholly commendable; but when that process has the end in view of either acquitting or convicting a particular accused person in advance, it is in the last degree reprehensible and in and of itself little short of a crime."

Playing to the Gallery

In Mr. Short's opinion if we are to have justice in this country there must be an abatement of public clamor. He says: "It must be recognized that the very end sought can only be accomplished in cases of importance by the press and the public refraining from much or violent discussions of the guilt or innocence of a particular person so accused until, by the deliberate, sober and dignified process of the law, which is nothing more or less than the people themselves speaking through their ordained institutions, the guilt or innocence of the party accused can be determined. Comment, criticism and controversy, if such we must have, should come afterwards. This is not only necessary as a matter of theory and as a matter of sentiment, but as a condition to be applied to the question of results it is the only way and the only method whereby we can hope to so administer our laws that within a reasonable time and in an orderly way guilty men can be convicted and duly punished, and innocent men can be vindicated and acquitted. These considerations not only relate to the selection of juries, but to the entire trial. If the accused is being tried by the press and public clamor; if the court is commended or condemned because its attitude is so unjudicial that it openly favors one side or the other, or condemned because its position is unknown; if the probable bias of the jury is a matter of public discussion; if the lawyers are called upon to play to the galleries a greater part of the time instead of trying the case like sworn professional gentlemen, what chance is there to conclude such a trial in a reasonble time or to secure results consistent with the boasted record of our race for its respect for right and justice? Many a guilty man has gone free because unwarranted public clamor has created a situation rendering it next to impossible to obtain an intelligent or impartial jury, or because, consistent with public clamor, the trial has been so conducted as to render it impossible for an honest appellate court to affirm the judgment, no matter how much they might desire to do so."

"You mean to say that the use of hair-dye is dangerous?"

"I do. Let me tell you something. A dear friend of mine, a happy bachelor, found his hair was turning gray at thirty. Well, he had it dyed a deep black. Four weeks later he was married."

Newspaper Brummagem

Is there anything more deliciously funny than the efforts of some of our local journalists to wield the English language? If there is I would like to know what, for I am constantly in quest of that which will make me laugh and grow fat. Whenever I am in a pensive mood I turn over the pages of our newspapers and invariably find a pill to purge my melancholy. It is not difficult to discover these irritants for a sluggish humor, for the editors have a way of letting their so-called "fine writers" cavort over their own signatures. One of these lingual gymnasts let himself loose on the occasion of the recent football game with such dire results that if the English language had been a paper-covered hoop such as clowns jump through, it would have been so torn to tatters that half-a-dozen real stylists would have despaired of repairing it. From this phrase-twister I learn with interest that "color flaunted rampant" at the big game and that "eyes of blue, of brown, of every imaginable shade, flashed from soft visages which glowed upon a ground of blue and gold." I had not time to puzzle over this last statement for I was fascinated with the picture of the governor who sat there "modestly and non-committal." Here is artistry in words with a vengeance, I thought, but plodding painfully along I found that there were "fair women, i. e. girls" present and that "their gowns were symphonies, their tailor-made suits the daintiest of conceits"; truly a distinction with a difference if one could but fathom it. But a little physical detail must not be overlooked—"their feet, small and impractical, it seemed too delicate to walk upon." Here grammar wars so vigorously with nature that I am completely at a loss to tell which has the worst of it. Certainly I sympathize with the fair women whom fate has served so inadequately in the matter of feet. Then I found that with the appearance of the Stanford team "the excitement of the afternoon was pitched," whereas, on the other hand, and quite impartially, a spectacular run "gave the enthusiasm its proper key"; also that "shouting was in vogue" and that the serpentine "moved with a fascinating reptilian grace." Of course it may all be beautiful but it is not English.

A Little Nature Faking—Also Mrs. Atherton

Turning to another paper and to an account of the domestic broils of the Stevensons and Osbornes, I came across a bit of nature faking which I cannot allow to be lost in the files. As well as I could make out it was intended to describe Lloyd Osborne and his bride making love in the South Seas. This may be a poor guess, but at any rate here is the way it ran: "Her mind sought the past—the past in which a Stanford girl and a dreamer of charming dreams clasped fingers along the southern seas, with a royal palm whispering nonsense to the gurgling ocean and a silly moon touching the land of their love with its smile of silver." Lewis Carroll might have dropped that out of his portfolio of foolishness. It shows that the royal palm has no monopoly of nonsense and that the moon is not alone in silliness; also it suggests that to the bathetic all things are bathos. Now I am not a preacher of preciosity and I am willing to make all sorts of allowances for hastily-carpentered newspaper articles, but it strikes me that here are instances of reporters plunging wrong-headedly along a road that leads away from good English when it is just as easy, if not easier, to take the proper direction. Have these men never studied our classic English writers? It seems inconceivable; yet their lucubrations outdo the worst efforts of the Indiana school of novelists. At the risk of seeming school-masterly I am going to recommend to their earnest attention an article contributed to one of the morning papers quite recently by a California writer whose style has won the well deserved encomiums of masters like George Meredith. I refer to Gertrude Atherton, and to her withering "roast" of our good society people for their luke-warm appreciation of the dancing of Miss Dibblee. Compare this bit of a sentence with some of the brummagem I have been quoting and note the warmth of sincerity which goes hand in hand with beautiful English: "Miss Ynez Dibblee is like a beautiful flagon wrought in California, but filled with the wine of old Spain." Our slingers of journalese might perspire through a dozen convoluted paragraphs without saying as much. These words sing in the brain and will not allow themselves to be forgotten. And again, citing quite at random: "I sincerely hope that Miss Ynez Dibblee will shake her magnificent skirts in the face of San Francisco and go to Europe, where she belongs." Here is no adjectival debauch but the sober manipulation of language by one who is an artist and therefore knows that thought must be compressed into words, not words expanded to hide the nakedness of thought. Let our journalistic "fine writers" show sincere purpose of trying to approximate this sort of English and I shall be the first to applaud their efforts.

"Chastity in the Pen"

If I did not know the race of newspapermen as well as I do, I might be tempted to fire a few preceptial sentences at them in connection with the foregoing criticism. I mignt appeal to Aristotle who has many good things to say anent propriety of diction; or I could cull a warning here and there from Quintilian or Cicero. It is better not to. Your true newspaperman prefers to find these things out for himself; he hates pedagogues. So I will content myself with reminding him that old Demetrius Phalereus, discoursing "Of Elocution," remarked that it is not uncommon to find subjects of great dignity dressed in mean language. What would the old grammarian have said if he could have lived to read newspapers wherein mean subjects are decked in splendacious finery? I might mention too that that polished old Scot, Lord Kames, had occasion to say: "Nothing in language ought to be more studied than to prevent all obscurity in the expression; for to have no meaning is but one degree worse than to have a meaning that is not understood." But I think the hint which Hilaire Belloc, writing recently of Hans Christian Andersen, couched in the following words, will be more helpful than anything I could quote: "Lastly, I say, that Andersen said what he had to say and no more. This quality in writers is not restraint—a futile word dear to those who cannot write—it is rather a sort of chastity in the pen. The writer of this kind is one who unconsciously does not add; if anyone were to ask him why he should not add an ornament or anything suppositious, he would be bewildered and perhaps might answer: 'Why should I?' The instinct behind it is that which produces all terse-

Hall Caine's Apologia

Even as an unconscious humorist Hall Caine has never appealed to my literary taste, but I must admit a passing weakness for those occasional manifestations of his personality which find their way into the public prints while he is in labor with a book and during the subsequent period when he is slowly recovering from the pangs of authorship. Caine's very latest is called forth by the coroner. Start not, gentle reader. It is not as you surmise or hope. Caine still lives and the coroner has merely been sitting upon his books. It seems that a London coroner, at a recent inquest on a servant girl who was addicted to the fiction habit, took occasion to make some satirical comments on the mental caliber of those who devote themselves to novel-reading. As the young woman had been an assiduous devotee of Caine—I understand that most servant girls are—this coroner with a taste for impolite literary criticism turned the edge of his satire against the thin skin of the Manxman. When I read of this audacious coroner I knew that Caine would put his pen in rest and have at him full tilt and I was not disappointed. Listen to this: "If some doddering coroner was confronted by the misdeeds of a silly servant girl who wasted the time of her mistress in reading penny dreadfuls, he felt himself justified in insulting with blatant abuse the life work of a body of men and women whose boots he was not fit to wipe." Herein is Caine not only plainspoken but amazingly courageous—not in defying the "doddering coroner" but in casting reflections upon so large a body of his readers as the race of servant girls aforesaid. Of course he would naturally feel indignant to learn that a servant girl spent any of her time reading penny-dreadfuls when she might be so much more profitably employed with his own five-shilling shockers, but that is beside the mark for the servant girl in question was addicted to Caine's novels. Of course Caine goes on to justify his latest book and his words are so touching that I must repeat them: "However imperfect, it was at least the best I could do; badly or imperfectly written, it was at all events conscientiously done; it was for three years my only interest; I was living in it and for it; I believed quite sincerely that its subject was worthy of whatever talents Nature had given me, and that I was really occupying myself with certain of the gravest thoughts that govern the welfare of humanity. My book may disappear—will disappear—I have counted upon that, too, and am quite prepared for it." Reader, if you are not moved to tears by these heart-throbs, what a callous unsympathetic person you must be. I am afraid the description fits me.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy.

Stocks: There is really very little to say of the securities market, fluctuations in leading stocks being unimportant and small, with liquidation in spots from specific causes. The weakness developed at times was largely the result of professional selling. Important interests were credited with doing nothing except accumulate on a scale of leading issues, with further progress in the copper merger reported. Copper stocks were leaders in the matter of an advance. Perfect control of the copper metal market in the future seems to be assured. Interboro Rapid Transit stocks were also a feature in strength and volume of trading during the week. This corporation will eventually be the holding company of the Greater New York Traction systems and will be a large earner under the reorganization plans. The checking of the upward move in steel had a salutary effect on the operations of the public in the market and really stopped speculation which was desired by banking interests. The money situation was the chief topic of interest to the street. Excessive rates of interest were not in evidence, however, though the surplus reserve was in danger of being wiped out at the close of the day's business. The money situation abroad has turned for the better and we expect to see the same conditions prevail here in the coming week or so and without tension in the interim. We rather expect to see a betterment in values later and without material declines, if such occur.

Grain: Wheat has responded to world news and smaller northwestern receipts. Our markets got on a flour shipping basis for the east and the Pacific Coast grain is moving in a steady stream, along with a good flour export. The low prices of last week were reflected in a fall down of receipts, indicating the attitude of the American farmer towards the markets. We have now reached the period of light shipments and there will be no great advance in visible, thus placing the market in a good fighting position. The Kansas State report with a yield per acre of two bushels less than the government, is the first evidence that the crop has been exaggerated in that State. This is the first year that the Kansas State Board yield has been under the government. Broomhall's estimate that Europe will need 17,000,000 bushels more than exporting countries can furnish, had a bullish effect on prices but this estimate is based on cheaper prices leading Europe to replenish depleted stocks and cannot be used if prices hold at present levels. His estimate calls for 70,000,000 more than last year, if prices remain low. The most impressive news was frost in Argentina, which last year at this time cut down the crop fifty million bushels. It will be some time before the extent of the frost is known, and we are likely to hear more of it. However the present price is high on all information, and a break will come, if there is any wide denial of the Argentina story. We are still largely on a domestic basis, and the wise course is to buy on all breaks of 2 cents or more, and to sell on bulges like this one when bull news slackens.

Corn: The government corn report was bullish on quantity, bearish on quality and uncovered a commercial crimp the same as last year. Supplies of old corn were 20,000,000 under conservative estimates, and none of it coming to the markets. The weather has not only retarded curing, but has caused deterioration of the corn in the big states, where moisture is excessive. It begins to look as if December will have a big bulge and no heavy shipments can be expected, and at present prices, a loss of weight in artificial drying would add five cents a bushel. No new corn has yet graded contract in any market. The tendency is still upward.

Cotton: The action of the cotton market the past week only serves more firmly to convince us that cotton should for the present be bought on all recessions. All in all, the campaign from a bullish standpoint, if indeed it may be called a campaign, has been in the extreme conservative. The operators in the market who took their position many months ago at low prices and have pinned their faith to 15, 16 and even in some instances, 17 cent cotton, have not been in a hurry to reach the goal, but have rather preferred that the staple on its merits and on a basis of supply and demand, encouraged by the actual buying of manufacturers, should set the pace for any advance in the option list. One feature which probably the public have not realized is that the foreign manufacturer, without making much noise about it, has been steadily taking American cotton, and even though the exports have been well in excess of last year up to this time, advices of the last day or so describe particularly the Continental manufacturer as being but meagerly supplied for his wants. Here in America our mill friends tell us, particularly southern manufacturers, that they are not supplied with their cotton. South Carolina spins about 25 per cent more cotton than she produces, yet large amounts have been exported from that State and the cotton to supply the mills must be bought from other States that have fewer mills. At present the market is unquestionably a two sided affair, but with spots furnishing the underlying strength, declines will prove to be limited and temporary.

Boston Copper Stocks: During the past week, the Boston copper share market has put on a very firm appearance following the report of a combination or community of interests to curtail the output of copper metal ten per cent and in consequence, the standard copper shares have been rising steadily. Copper metal is the only commodity on the list that has not experienced a rise for a long time and at the present quotations, it stands in the same position that cotton did last fall when it was selling for nine cents a pound. Based on existing contracts and the usual yearly ten per cent increase in the use of the metal, it will take over 2,000,000 pounds of copper metal to supply the consumption in 1910. This copper boom has come to stay. There are innumerable uses for copper metal that have come into vogue within the past few years and many more channels for the use of copper are presenting themselves. The great transcontinental lines, not only of the United States and Canada, but of practically the whole world, are supplementing their equipment with telephones, which means the use of new wires; all kinds of steam mining pumps and hoists are being supplanted by electrical apparatus; much of the copper metal is going into automobiles, especially electric machines; in the great logging camps of Washington and British Columbia electrically driven motors and engines are superceding steam for the reason that they are more economical and prevent forest fires; and lastly, much of the metal is going into agricultural tractors, separators and improved farming motor machinery. There are but 250 producing copper mines in the entire world and it is more within reason to look forward to a shortage of the metal than to a permanent surplus. A great many copper companies are at that stage where they cannot be longer classed as mining stocks but are now full fledged industrials. Take the Nevada Consolidated for instance. This company has enough ore already blocked out and in sight to last for the next 50 years, to say nothing of new ground which has not as yet been explored and which will be in time opened up. Much criticism has been aimed at the Amalgamated Copper stocks for the reason that it is claimed that this stocks sells for a greatly inflated price when its earnings and assets are taken into consideration. The public little knows of the vast outside holdings of this company. Amalgamated Copper owns and operates, in addition to its copper properties in Montana, extensive coal mines in Montana and Wyoming, has also timber lands and saw mills and owns much copper bearing territory in Mexico and Southern California. Copper stocks bought at the present market prices will in a short time yield large profits and when the new copper merger advances the price of the metal, the earning power of the leading mines will be greatly increased which will also aid materially in the general advance.

Local Securities: California stocks and bonds continue to maintain their reputation for history-makers and the general list has seen some notable advances during the past week or so. One of the most interesting moves of our recent local dealings was the sharp advance and wild trading in Spring Valley Water. As was pointed out in last week's review, there has been a steady absorbtion of these shares for some time past with occasional "tips," from authoritative sources, of an impending boom. This boom materialized the other day when Spring Valley stock came in for some wild buying and was run up about $4 a share and it was learned that the water company had entered into actual negotiations with the "City Fathers" for the sale of their distributing system in this city. Since that rise, the stock has been very irregular and has had to contend with a deal of profit-taking and also has been at the mercy of ever-changing rumors concerning the final terms of the prospective sale. As has been consistently "harped" on in this column, Alaska Packers has been steadily forging ahead and has even now arrived at a stage where those who got in on the start, which was not over two months ago, have already handsome profits in sight. From learned circles comes the information that the Association will earn close to a million dollars this season and that the stock will be put on a dividend basis at the next annual meeting which takes place in the latter part of next January. Hawaiian sugar stocks continue in point of activity and their market values are increasing almost daily. It is said that the sugar industry in the islands is in grand condition though outside of this and the fact that raw sugar is still rising in New York, there is little news on this group of stocks. Associated Oil has rather quieted down though last week's advance has been pretty well sustained. Pacific Telephone stocks, especially the common, have been very erratic and seem to lack ginger. The common stock does not show much change from one week to another, either losing early gains in the closing days of the week or just the opposite. Power stocks have been well taken and following the lead of Northern California Power, have practically all sought higher levels. Pacific Gas and Electric stocks have once again taken the fancy of the Easterners and they are once more bidding for them. The main advance in the local bond market has been in Spring Valley Water 4s, California Gas and Electric 5s and United Railroads 4s. The balance of the bond list has been active in spots without much change. For the immediate future, it is said that purchases of Pacific Gas common and preferred, Alaska Packers and Associated Oil, on any break, will be the most profitable. Speaking generally, almost any stock on the California security list should show a profit by the first of the year.

Absence Makes Peter Melancholy

Everybody is commenting on the effect which absence from his wife has had on Peter Martin. Mrs. Martin did not accompany her husband to this city but is sojourning with her friends of the Atlantic seaboard. And that Peter misses her there is no gainsaying. For Peter Martin the treacle-moon has never waned. Hence the poignant effect of temporary separation. Time was when Peter Martin was the gayest of our gay young blades. Wherever the night lights gleamed in this naughty town of ours Peter's was a familiar figure. His step was a dancing measure and his eye flashed with the joy of living. Dull care was drowned in wine and every thought of the morrow was routed with laughter whenever Peter disported himself. But all that is changed. Peter has become the knight of the melancholy countenance, a veritable sobersides, chary of smiles and disinclined to laughter. Not for him the frivolity of the madcap hours or the breathless gaiety of the joy ride. Almost any evening you may see him wending his solitary way along the dignified pavement of Pacific avenue or Broadway, bound for his mother's house. His step is measured, his look contemplative and his whole demeanor suggests il penseroso. That the temporary absence of his beautiful wife in the East has dashed his ebullient spirits and converted his erstwhile sunny outlook into one of monastic gloom there can be no denying. I am sorry to see Peter so quickly metamorphosed to the semblance of a sad Antonio. 'Tis unnatural. Why should a man who so loves the world look like his grandsire cut in alabaster? Husband and wife cannot be together always. And does not absence keen-edge the joy of meeting once more? I sincerely hope that the twain will be speedily united and that we may have an end of this melancholy demeanor in one to whom we look for the quintessence of mirth. Tribute though it be to conjugal affection, it has a dampening effect upon the exuberance of friends who are delighted that Peter is once more in our midst.

Greenway Scores On His Rivals

Mr. Edward Greenway returned from the East this week and was not in the least disconcerted when he looked over the field upon which the battle of Fizz Water raged in his absence. Mr. Greenway always has his emotions well in hand. The storms that sweep over the field of commerce have no more effect upon him than the mild ebullitions of a debutante's temper. The vexations of trade rivalries affect his composure no more than the reproaches of disappointed climbers. Whether in the country dance or in the counting house Mr. Greenway's self-possession invariably approximates perfection. It must be admitted, however, that at this time of life Mr. Greenway does not relish the loss of his chief assistant in the business of stimulating the flow of champagne. The defection of Joe Murphy probably gave him a momentary shock, for Joe's capacity is great and few men there are with greater zeal for the truths unborn which the juice of the grape reveals; few that will plunge with greater zest to the deeps of a bottle of Mumms for some of the ten thousand secrets that there are kept. But Mr. Greenway was not long without an assistant. With that rare sagacity which distinguishes him both as a leader of society and the representative of the house of Du Barry he promptly filled the vacancy on his staff by selecting Tom McCann for the job. McCann is probably the most popular wine agent in San Francisco. He has a host of friends that drink wine and with them hereafter Mumms will be the word.

Exclusiveness is Not the Rule

It is the delight of some of our snobbish bavardes to persuade the plain people that the contraction of the fashionable herd is the most cherished object of the leaders of our provincial aristocracy, and that as a consequence the so-called smart set is every day gaining in exclusiveness. To insinuate this notion into the minds of the plain people the bavardes report at brief intervals that Mr. or Mrs. Somebody has revised the list of eligibles and decided that not more than two hundred, or possibly three hundred, have been properly branded for some particular function. But of course the fact is that while everybody in society is not invited everywhere, there is nobody in society who isn't invited somewhere. It is also a fact that there isn't a house in town large enough to hold all the people who have at one time or another attended some function admittedly of the elect. After all is said and done the branding iron that is worth while is Greenway's, and though Ned is called a Czar he is in reality the most democratic of rulers. To be sure he has a steadfast principle upon which he discriminates, but it is a broad principle and it favors expansion rather than contraction.

The Honoring of a Debutante

Mrs. James Shea has been entertaining lavishly of late in honor of her charming debutante niece, Miss Kathleen Farrell. She has given several functions at the Fairmont, one of which was a dinner preceding the first Greenway Assembly. It was attended by some of the most interesting representatives of the haut ton. Miss Farrell is a cultured girl who has traveled abroad, and who is much admired for her accomplishments. Mrs. Shea is a prominent member of the Caedmon Club, one of the most fashionable of the social organizations identified with the Catholic Church. She is also a representative of the exclusive Francisca Club.

Miss Dibblee's Dancing

Whatever difference of opinion there may be regarding the dancing of Miss Ynez de la Guerra Dibblee, there isn't a woman in town who saw her at her debut at the St. Francis Musical Art Society that doesn't go into raptures over her superb dress. Such flawless good taste, such artistic deftness and appreciation of color effects is not to be seen every day. Miss Dibblee is daringly original, and if my judgment counts for anything, I should say that she is amply justified in believing that she can go to little old New York and step right up to the pinnacle of fame. Her movements were full of continual surprises. Light as a bird and just as full of the effervescent joy of life, Miss Dibblee's dancing was a pure fascination. The girl has beauty too, far more than is suggested by her pictures, for the animation that lights up her Castilian face is too fleeting and changeful to be perpetuated in dull black and white. She has the grace of the Spanish belle with the enduring cleverness of the American.

Mrs. Atherton's Guests

It was a pleasure to watch Mrs. Gertrude Atherton's rapt enthusiasm as she applauded Miss Dibblee. She followed the girl's dancing in complete enthrallment. Her enthusiasm was positively infectious. With Mrs. Atherton were Mrs. Frank Proctor of Boston and Mrs. James B. Coryell, both of them looking uncommonly handsome. Mrs. Coryell is pretty like a blue-eyed Titian-haired doll. Mrs. Proctor is the typical vivacious

American, gifted with a knack for wearing her clothes gracefully. Mrs. Coryell's gown was decidedly the most stunning thing at the concert and as becoming to her blonde fairness as could be. It was of bluish-black chiffon, heavily brocaded with velvet fleur-de-lis in an all-over design. About the hem the flowers were very large, graduating in size towards the corsage. The skirt was looped up on one side, revealing the underskirt of light blue satin shot with gold threads. The train was rather shorter than those worn in previous seasons and fuller as well. Down the back of the dress was a narrow panel of brocaded blue silk with gold thistles, the panel narrowing at the waist and growing broader toward the edge of the train. With this Mrs. Coryell wore a big hat lined in long-haired fur, with an enormous bunch of white paradise aigrettes completely covering it. The fur looked a bit heavy and incongruous, out of keeping with the dainty gown and its accessories. It was one of those vagaries of fashion which are considered chic because Paris says so.

Mrs. Keppel and King Edward

It has always seemed to me a laughable commentary on so-called American democracy that no sooner does one of our "sturdily independent" citizens gain admittance to those circles of London society where the scandals of Mayfair and Belgravia are the absorbing topic of conversation than he becomes infected with the gossipping fever and is never so happy as when repeating that bright sally which the Duke of Thingummy got off at the expense of the Countess of Whatshername. Of course if he can give you a little inside information about King Edward's amours he is as proud as he might reasonably be if his progenitor had signed the Declaration of Independence. Such a one—and a good fellow too—has been writing me from London about King Edward and Mrs. Keppel; in fact he has inked sheet after sheet of good white paper with details of what he calls this "toothsome subject." How Mrs. Keppel's ancestry has been traced back to the abysm of time when her forebears made and unmade kings; how her husband has been created "King's Orderly Officer," a post the duties of which nobody understands because there are none except the obligation which is placed upon Keppel of being continually at court with his charming wife; how King Edward has been visiting all of Mrs. Keppel's relations in England and Scotland, the fascinating Mrs. Keppel, of course, being on hand to help entertain him; and how the entrancing Mrs. Keppel has left gloomy old Portman Square for ultra-fashionable Grosvenor street; and any amount of the same sort of tattle. And in conclusion he tips me a sort of inky wink with the remark that "society is smiling knowingly" at all these attentions to the Keppels. Well, I suppose society is smiling knowingly, as it has smiled knowingly before when the king showered favors upon his feminine chums. Whether the Hon. George Keppel smiles knowingly or affects a myopic indifference in the presence of amorous royalty, I don't know; and what's more, I don't give the value of a farthing to find out. Why should I be expected to care what particular flower of beauty and grace is treading the path of dalliance with an aged ruler who ought to be preparing for the next world by doing penance for the indiscretions he has committed in this.

EVERY WOMAN

Covets a fresh, smooth, satiny complexion, and what satisfaction and peace of mind its possession brings. The lines of age, worry and overwork are rendered well nigh powerless by Mrs. Nettie HARRISON'S LOLA MONTEZ CREME. A wonderful soother, healer and protector to a dry, contracted or chapped skin. It is Complexion Insurance. A Jar (3 months' treatment) 75 cents at all Druggists. To convince you of its remarkable power, I will send a free sample and "Beauty Book" on request. Mrs. NETTIE HARRISON, San Francisco.

She Preaches the "Best Things"

Mrs. John Vance Cheney who has been making a name for herself since leaving California, has aroused the interest of the women of the California Club with her "International League of Right Thinking and Right Living," in which are enrolled many who stand for light and leading in present-day thought. Mrs. Cheney is so splendidly endowed for the teachings of the cult that makes women despise nervous prostration and hysteria as thoroughly as stupidity or ugliness, that one does not wonder at her success everywhere. She is of Junoesque proportions, has a complexion of baby-like pinkness and abundant hair of curling silvery silkiness, and her dresses are dreams. According to her theory, one has only to wish for the best things, believe thoroughly in one's right to have them and presto—they appear. Health, happiness, beauty, fine clothes, adoration and a nice home are among the "best things" of this heavenly cult. Quite a number of men have listened to Mrs. Cheney's discourses; professors from Berkeley and ministers being of the number.

The Ella Wheeler Wilcox System

I do not know whether Mrs. Cheney approves of Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox who, having exhausted the poetry of passion, now writes on predigested philosophy for the Hearst syndicate of newspapers. But Mrs. Wilcox has a System of right thinking and right living of her own and never wearies of expounding it. From her own words I learn that it includes "massage, vibration, oil rubs, facial creams, metaphysical ideas and rest cures" and I fancy that there is variety enough in it to commend it to women of the most divergent tastes. Thus if one has no need of massage or oil rubs, one may go in for metaphysical ideas and when one tires of vibration or facial cream, there is always the rest cure. According to a recent essay by Mrs. Wilcox entitled "Believing and Doubting" this System was used by a woman who a few years ago "passed out of her body." Before this lamentable happening she boasted "a beautiful complexion, wonderful vitality and a brilliant, resourceful mind," all due of course to the Wilcox System. This woman whose name is not given, had many friends, I learn from Mrs. Wilcox, who scoffed at her devotion to oil rubs, metaphysical ideas, etc. Of course they were properly punished; they "grew old and lost their interest in life and passed out of the body long before they reached her years." I trust that those who are not altogether satisfied with Mrs. Cheney's teachings will find something in Mrs. Wilcox's System to save them from the awkwardness of "passing out of the body" for many many years.

A Mistake in Opera Cloaks

Some of the guests at the brilliant gathering of the St. Francis Musical Art Society were treated to a "stunt" which was not on the program and which has caused no end of talk ever since. One of the prominent women present wore a very handsome opera cloak, obviously a Parisian creation. As the evening wore along she loosened it and threw it across the back of her chair. When the concert was over she crossed the room to greet a friend, forgetting her cloak for the minute and as she turned back to her chair she was amazed to find it reposing on the arm of a well-known woman who was making her way from the concert room. Recovering herself quickly she said: "Excuse me, this is my cloak." "I beg your pardon, it is my mine," replied the second lady quite haughtily. Without further words the owner seized the cloak and walked away.

Miss Miriam Ames Engaged

The engagement is announced of Miss Miriam Ames, daughter of the late Mrs. Anne Brewster Ames, and Albert Edward Smith of New York City. Miss Ames is a strikingly attractive young girl with a wealth of beautiful blond hair which falls in curls around her piquant face. Miss Ames' father was the late Samuel Ames of Albany, N. Y. After his death his widow and young daughter came to California, taking up their residence in this city where they made many warm friends. Mrs. Ames died suddenly a few months ago, leaving her daughter practically alone. She had completed arrangements for a long residence in Honolulu where her daughter, being an exceptionally bright young girl, had intended taking up a business career. Now Cupid has stepped in to change her plans. Mr. Smith is a wealthy insurance man of New York. Miss Ames will leave early next month for the East and her wedding will follow immediately upon her arrival in the metropolis. Many "showers" are being planned for this charming young girl before her departure. Miss Ames is an intimate friend of Miss Brooke Rose whose engagement to Frederick P. Hastings of Boston was announced a few months ago. After the wedding of Miss Rose these two friends will reside near each other in New York.

Paying Braganza's Debts

A correspondent abroad has sent me some interesting details about the debts of the Prince of Braganza—interesting because they throw considerable light on one of the international "romances" about which the bavardes prate so much. No doubt plenty of our ambitious debutantes with wealthy papas would like to exchange places with the erstwhile Anita Stewart who is now the Princess of Braganza, so a little enlightenment about the sordid details of this alliance may have a tonic effect upon their sickly desires. My correspondent says that now that they know he has an immensely rich mother-in-law, Mrs. James Henry Smith, Prince Miguel's creditors are turning the screws on him remorselessly. In pursuing this policy some creditors actually tried to attach valuables belonging to Count Czirmay, Prince Miguel's closest friend, who had indorsed some of his notes. Exaggerated reports are current among the Prince's creditors, usurers, most of them, about the wealth the Princess will inherit some day. They seek to keep up their spirits by telling each other that her mother has $35,000,000 on deposit in the Bank of England. But Mrs. Smith's American friends say her husband bequeathed most of his great fortune to his kin. He tells me also that when Mrs. Smith was in Paris just before her daughter's marriage it was well known to her informally through Austrian diplomatic channels that Prince Miguel's creditors demanded $2,000,000 to settle their claims. Like an affectionate and ambitious mother, she replied that she was concerned only with her daughter's happiness and would deal fairly with the Prince's creditors after the marriage. Then Mrs. Smith's lawyers examined the claims and discovered that they were extortionate. At a family council, at which the lawyers were present, Prince Miguel expressed the decided opinion that his honor demanded that the claims be paid in full. But the lawyers offered his creditors two-thirds of the amount they demanded—a generous proposition, for the usurious interest that has piled up amounts to as much money as the Prince borrowed. The Prince will not return to Austria until his financial affairs have been settled. A settlement will be only a matter of time, probably. When his creditors realize that his mother-in-law will not be imposed on they undoubtedly will abate their claims.

A Marguerite Beauty

Dainty Elva De Pue has emerged from the fledgling into the debutante set and a fine winter is predicted for her. She is blest with a way of looking for the good in everything and everybody and has none of the verdant hauteur of the hoity-toity boarding school miss. Moreover she is pretty, pretty as a marguerite, and never looked that part more so than last Tuesday when she made her debut at the big tea given by Mrs. Edgar De Pue. Miss Elva wore white, a gossamer net all sprinkled with seed pearls and glimmering crystal beads, made over white satin. It was a girlishly dainty little frock with its surplice waist and cloud-like white net. Nearly all of the buds received with her.

The Greenway Party

The Assembly dance at the Fairmont last night was as great a success as any of the Greenways preceding it, and in some respects, it was even more brilliant than usual. Mr. and Mrs. Patrick Calhoun had a handsome dinner in the gray room for thirty of their friends, all of them being seated about a table that looked like a huge golden bouquet. The gold service was used and the flowers were in several shades of yellow, making as artistic a picture as could be imagined. Mrs. Calhoun who is a tall blonde of fine proportions, with the typical sunny disposition characteristic of the southern women, looked particularly handsome in a princess of rose point lace, the whole cobwebby thing woven in one piece. It was as simple as could be—nothing but lace, but it was the daintiest work of deft convent fingers. Others at the table were Mr. and Mrs. William Babcock, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Pillsbury, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Kohl, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. George Howard, Mr. and Mrs. Willis Polk, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Anderson, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Eastland, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph S. Tobin, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Wilson, Miss Sallie Maynard, Miss Margaret Calhoun, Mr. Henry Michael and Mr. Thornwell Mullally. The beautiful Mrs. Clement Tobin gave another large dinner at the Fairmont, entertaining the debutantes and their friends in honor of her sister, Miss Vera De Sabla. The two girls are devoted to each other, but a more contrasted pair it would be difficult to find. Mrs. Tobin is tall and willowy and blonde and gorgeous while Vera is the shy little violet, caring not a rap about jewels and the frou-frou and fol-de-rol of fashions. All of the debutantes were feted at one dinner party or another, and if there is any schism in Greenway's set it was not apparent at the ball. The decorations were nothing in particular, the King and his court caring little for spectacular effects.

To Give a Play For Charity

One of the interesting charity events of the month will be the rendering of the play written by Mrs. Harry Allston Williams, entitled "If Things Could Talk in Berkeley," to be given in the college town at Unity Hall, corner of Bancroft Way and Dana street, on the evening of Tuesday, the twenty-third. Twenty-five talented young men and women have been in rehearsal for several weeks under the personal direction of Mrs. Williams and promise to give a most pleasing production. After the play there will be dancing. The entertainment will be given for the benefit of the work in West Berkeley of the Chapel of the Good Shepherd of Saint Mark's Parish and is under the patronage of Mrs. Chas. E. Bancroft, Miss Bayard, Mrs. Chas. T. Blake, Mrs. Chas. Mills Gayley, Mrs. Washington Irving, Mrs. S. S. Johnson, Mrs. Cabell C. Kinney, Mrs. Chas. Rees Lloyd, Mrs. Bernard Moses, Mrs. Edward Lambe Parsons, Mrs. Allen M. Sutton, Mrs. Sidney V. Smith, Mrs. Chauncey Wetmore Wells, Mrs. W. A. Wilson, Mrs. T. J. Wrampelmeier.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 19122.

ANGELO SBRAGIA, Plaintiff,

vs.

All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California, to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants, Greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of ANGELO SBRAGIA, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the Southerly line of Sacramento Street, distant thereon sixty-two (62) feet and six (6) inches westerly from the westerly line of Locust Street, running thence westerly and along said southerly line of Sacramento Street twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles southerly one hundred (100) feet; thence at right angles easterly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles northerly one hundred (100) feet to the southerly line of Sacramento Street and the point of commencement.

Being a portion of Western Addition Block number eight hundred thirty-two (832).

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the Complaint, to-wit: for judgment establishing and quieting said plaintiff's title to all said real property as the owner thereof in fee simple, and determining all adverse claims thereto, and ascertaining and determining all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property and every part thereof, and for such other and further relief as may be just and proper in the premises, under and pursuant to the provisions of the Act of the Legislature of California entitled, "An Act to provide for the establishment and quieting of title to real property in case of loss and destruction of public records," approved June 16, 1906.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Court this 11th day of November, A. D. 1909.

Mr. Hopkinson, Virtuous Though Vulgar

By Edward F. O'Day

Poor Mr. Hopkinson! "Whatever gods there be" were most unkind to him. In the first place they made him most unpresentable, even for Upper Tooting which partakes of the suburban character of Piedmont. In the second place they thrust upon him without preparation or warning eighty thousand pounds a year. That is a burden which you or I, of course, could stagger under, since we have been careful to cultivate tastes which will never be adequately satisfied unless we receive some such golden visitation. But with Mr. Hopkinson it was quite different; he didn't even smoke or drink between meals and as for the gilded vices with which he was brought into contact, well, a co-respondent in the flesh appalled him and the bare thought of a "second establishment" made him blush like an ingenue. Speaking of the gilded vices brings us naturally to the third reason why the fates must be considered distinctly and malevolently unkind to poor Mr. Hopkinson. They thrust him into very bad society. Let me not be misunderstood. I am not presuming to criticize the social standing of the Earl of Addleton and his daughter Lady Egglesby (what poultry names!), of the Duke and Duchess of Braceborough, of Lord Gawthorpe and the Hon. Otho Dursingham. Indeed, I am sure that their position is quite unimpeachable. Do they not belong to that innermost circle of British exclusiveness which might be termed the Mortgaged Class? Everyone of them is mortgaged to his or her aristocratic eyebrows. When I spoke of bad society I was thinking of morals. It must be admitted that Mr. Hopkinson fell among a most immortal lot. That is made quite clear from the first rise of the curtain. There is a tang of epigram about the conversation of these aristocrats which immediately arouses suspicion, for epigram has never been perfectly respectable in England. But there are darker indication than that. We are plainly told that Lord Gawthorpe has been co-respondent in a scandalous divorce suit and we are allowed to see just as plainly that Lord Gawthorpe and Lady Egglesby are drifting toward an entanglement of an unplatonic character. Why, even when Lady Egglesby proposes marriage to Gawthorpe, she wears a cigarette between her fingers. Think what her morals must be! Then there is the Duchess of Braceborough. She is quite satisfied that the Duke should philander with that married woman; in fact, if the horrid truth must be spoken, she is rather glad to get rid of him so that she may devote herself to the Hon. Otho Dursingham. The Earl of Addleton is the only noble of them all who does nothing scandalous and I suspect that he is old and feeble before his time on account of a misspent youth. Now I do not think it was quite fair for Mr. R. C. Carton to set Mr. Hopkinson down in the midst of these unholy aristocrats. There are, I believe, any number of noble English families, even in the Mortgaged Class, where family prayers are said and no money is lost at Ascot and co-respondents are discountenanced. Why couldn't he have guided Mr. Hopkinson and his eighty thousand pounds a year into the bosom of one of those families? For mind you, Mr. Hopkinson is no Tittlebat Titmouse. His introduction into the aristocracy makes him neither devilish nor extravagant. When it is all over his morals are untarnished and although he has used up a check book, the money was hardly flung at the little birds. Apparently, however, Mr. Carton regarded Mr. Hopkinson merely as material for comedy and not as a priceless human soul. It is shocking, but all writers of plays are conscienceless wretches, all except George Bernard Shaw who never endangers the morals of his characters because his characters never have any morals. Mr. Hopkinson has all the morals of Upper Tooting and just how moral Upper Tooting is may be inferred from the perfectly accurate statement of the Duchess of Braceborough that Nice is much nearer to aristocratic London than Upper Tooting is. But I am afraid Mr. Hopkinson's morals do not appear in a very attractive light. Although the stage is strewn with the shards of the shattered Decalogue, I find myself much more conscious of the aitches which Mr. Hopkinson drops everywhere. I don't seem to be at all shocked by the wicked conversation of these lords and ladies, but Mr. Hopkinson's slang fills me with unholy joy. Why should I laugh with these sporting characters and laugh at Mr. Hopkinson? This is no proper spirit for an American to display when he is admitted to "the winter garden of the duke's town house." After all, Mr. Hopkinson is not only a virtuous, if vulgar youth; he is thoroughly democratic. He is willing to meet these aristocratic indigents on an equal footing; it is no mean sacrifice to surrender Upper Tooting for Mayfair, to exchange honest parsimony for immoral and disquieting extravagance. Yet Mr. Hopkinson does it and never suspects that he is a hero. I think I am the only man in the audience who views him in the heroic light. I am willing to concede that my amazement at virtue joined to eighty thousand a year has something to do with this attitude; the combination is dazzling. Really, I have worked myself to such a height of moral exaltation over the moral character of Mr. Hopkinson that I am afraid I can't come down. Looking down from the dizzy peak of superior virtue upon which Mr. Hopkinson and I are perched, I see many attractive people walking about and my distance from them makes me a little lonesome. Between you and me, Mr. Hopkinson is mighty poor company away up here. But down below there Dallas Welford looks very attractive. I think I shall slide down and congratulate him on his excellent portrayal of Mr. Hopkinson. Strictly in confidence, Welford, and of course you won't tell Mr. Hopkinson what I say—I laughed my head off at your performance. My laugh is probably echoing around the Valencia Theatre still, for you know, Welford, the acoustics are not of the best. How did you manage to redden so when Eliza Dibb made her appearance? I thought you would burst a blood vessel. Of course I know you've studied Mr. Hopkinson from the life, though you may not have journeyed all the way to Upper Tooting to find him. Plenty of him in Soho, aren't there? You've brought a good company along with you, but I like Miss Barbara Clement best. She never overdoes it for a moment, does she? And when she breaks down and cries, it is just unexpected enough to be natural. A very capable young actress, I should say. Next to her I like Mr. Galwey Herbert; he's a cleancut performer and that smile is splendid. Get Carton to write you another play, Welford, and have the Shuberts send you along this way again just as quickly as possible. Please take good care of Mr. Hopkinson and don't let him redden too much every night or he may go off in apoplexy. Then Upper Tooting would lay the blame on the low moral tone of high society.

Victor Moore in Cohanesque

I would have liked Victor Moore from the ground up if it had not been for those green suede shoes. Why should any man want to wear green suede shoes? They bothered me all through the first act of "The Talk of New York." If Victor Moore had a mincing ladylike role, they might have been in character and even then they would be odious enough. But "Kid Burns" is a manly part full of healthy outdoor impulses and it seems to fit Victor Moore with the flexibility of cheveril. No disparagement to his bootmaker, but the green suede shoes did not fit him at all; they were distinctly out of the picture. No muscular slangster like the Kid would wear them and it was a great relief when he doffed them for the second act. After that I approved him thoroughly. The Yankee Doodle patter slides off his tongue as though he were to the manner born. Perhaps, like George Cohan, he was. Certainly, if playing "Kid Burns" is an acquired taste, it has the appropriateness of a second nature. I imagine that Ade or Hobart could frame a play for him that would show his talents to greater advantage than the present Cohan vehicle. "The Talk of New York" is continuously pleasing to the eye and ear. It has plenty of conscious humor and the climax of the third act is one of the best unconscious jokes that I have enjoyed for a long time. Maybe Cohan was poking fun at us when he fixed it up. The music is of the usual Cohanesque variety, good to listen to and forget. The American flag is waved as of yore, but Cohan is becoming liberal—he introduces this time the flags of all the nations, just to show his critics, I suppose, that he is not bigoted in his patriotism. From first to last "The Talk of New York" is a pleasant diversion, thanks to Victor Moore. It is not Cohan at his best, but probably that young gentleman has reserved the best for himself. We will find out in a week or so, for we are to see George himself very soon.

—The Second Nighter.

George Will Soon Be Here

The second and last week of "The Talk of New York" opens next Monday night. There will be a special holiday matinee on Thanksgiving Day. Immediately afterwards, George M. Cohan will come to the same playhouse and present "The Yankee Prince." The visit of the author-actor will be the first in seven years. Cohan will be surrounded by his family and the hundred other members of the original company. The advance sale of seats begins Thursday.

The Wullner Concerts

The long promised concerts by Dr. Ludwig Wullner, the lieder singer and his equally remarkable accompanist, Coenraad V. Bos, are at last at hand. The opening concert at the Novelty on Tuesday night will appeal strongly, as it contains some of Wullner's greatest successes. On Friday night, November 26 and Sunday afternoon, November 28 equally fine programs will be given and the works of several new composers will be heard for the first time in this city. Complete programs may be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co's.

"The Warrens of Virginia"

One of the most recent of David Belasco's successes, "The Warrens of Virginia," will be given its first production west of Chicago, in the Alcazar, commencing Monday evening. It is a drama of Civil War times written by William C. DeMille, the son of David Belasco's erstwhile collaborator, and after running 300 nights in New York, was one of the most profitable attractions on the road last season. All the Alcazar players will be in the cast. Evelyn Vaughan is to have the role of Agatha Warren, and John Ince will be seen to advantage as her Northern wooer. Howard Hickman will impersonate General Warren. Will R. Walling will be seen as the

"The Soul Kiss" at the Garrick

The attraction at the Garrick next week will be "The Soul Kiss." After an entire year on Broadway and visits to a few of the principal cities of the country, this musical comedy is making a tour that will extend from coast to coast, with most complete organization and scenic equipment. The premier danseuse, Pertina, has been acclaimed in London, Paris and Berlin and the newness of her dances will doubtless be one of the most pleasing features of the entertainment. She is assisted by a special ballet of ten of the best coryphees to be found in London. Besides these there are thirty handsome Broadway chorus girls. In reality, the "Soul Kiss" might aptly be termed "A Beauty Congress." Then there is the music of Mauric Levi and the comedy of Harry B. Smith. The combination should spell success. "The Soul Kiss" engagement is for eight days (which includes two Sundays), starting tomorrow night, and matinees are announced for Saturday and Thanksgiving Day.

Miss Case Sings on Sunday

All musical San Francisco is interested in the success of the Mary Adele Case concerts, the second of which will take place on Sunday afternoon. The program is a specially fine one and by request Miss Case will sing the Liddle aria "Abide With Me." Songs by Schubert, Franz, Georges, Lalo, Homer, Campbell Tipton, Mendelssohn and Walthew complete the offering and Meyerbeer's test piece for contraltos, "Ah! Mon Fils" will be repeated by request. Mr. Briggerstaff will play Moszkowski's brilliant "Caprice Espagnol."

Another Week of "Hoppy"

It is safe to say that the Valencia Theatre will be crowded to the doors during the second and last week of "Mr. Hopkinson," which begins this Sunday evening. The only matinees will be given on Thanksgiving and Saturday. Sunday night, November 28, the English actor, Charles Cherry, will begin an engagement limited to one week, in Clyde Fitch's "The Bachelor," which comes from the Maxime Elliott Theatre.

Novelties at the Orpheum

The Orpheum has a promising list of attractions for next week. John B. Hymer and a company of ten people will present a novelty entitled "The Devil and Tom Walker," the action of which takes place in the throne room of Hades. Mr. Hymer's support will include the beautiful and talented Elsie Kent. Ben Welch, the character comedian, is an old friend here. Vittoria and Giorgetta, who are on their first visit to this country, are equilibrists. Katchen Loisset, an Orpheum importation, comes here for the first time with a novel offering. She begins with English and German songs and subsequently introduces her trained pigeons and a remarkable dog called "Honey." Next week will be the last of The De Haven Sextette and Sydney C. Gibson, Howard's Musical Shetlands and Comedy Canines, Milt Wood, "The Dancer With the Chair," and Edwin Stevens. The latter, with Tina Marshall, will present his delightful entertainment, "An Evening With Dickens."

George Hamlin, the Tenor

George Hamlin, the American tenor who introduced the Richard Strauss songs in this country and afterwards met with wonderful success as a lieder singer abroad, will be the first December attraction of Manager Will L. Greenbaum. This is the first time that he has sung in this city. Accompanying Mr. Hamlin will be Edwin Schneider, the eminent composer and pianist. The Hamlin concerts will be given at the Novelty Theatre, the dates being Thursday, December 2, Sunday afternoon, December 5 and Tuesday night, December 7.

College Play at Ye Liberty

The Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, have an ideal attraction for Thanksgiving week in "Brown of Harvard," the famous college play. It was really this little comedy by Rida Johnson Young that started the run of college plays seen recently, but as usual in such cases, none of them have surpassed it in popular favor. The Bishop players can be depended upon to give it a thoroughly enjoyable interpretation next week. Sydney Ayres plays Tom Brown, and he should fit nicely into the character of the collegian hero. Harrison Ford makes his initial appearance with the company in another of the student roles, and George Friend, Robert Harrison, Andrew Bennison, Henry Shumer and the other favorites will appear to advantage, while the feminine end of the cast will be well taken care of by Maude Odell, Edith Lyle, Claribel Becker and Mrs. Mina Gleason. In addition to the regular Saturday and Sunday matinee performances of "Brown of Harvard," there will be a special matinee performance on Thanksgiving Day.

A New Comedy in New York

Much interest has been excited in New York by the production in the New Theatre of "The Cottage in the Air," a light comedy by Knoblauch, already known in this country as the author of "The Shulamite." The heroine is a young princess of a minor German principality, who, rebelling against the formality of court life, longs for an opportunity to live "with the poor and for the poor," dreaming of a cottage in the air. Suddenly her father, the grand duke, without consulting her, announces her betrothal to a young English prince. Although she loves the prince, this precipitate action drives her to flight. Taking her old tutor (a mere bookworm), she steals away to England in search of her cottage. The remaining acts show her attempts to live in it, with and for the poor, until she is ready to resume her royal station and marry the prince. The play is in four acts, the first showing the grand ducal palace, the second the garden before the cottage in England, and the third and fourth the interior of the cottage. In the cast of characters are Rose Coghlan, Jessie Busley and others.

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

Written exclusively for Town Talk by J. M. JACOBI

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

King Edward's Influence on Fashion

It may not be generally known that the King of England introduced the dinner coat. Such, however, is the case. When the King as Prince of Wales made his famous tour of Egypt and the Holy Land, several decades ago, he found the usual form of dress coat too warm for comfort. He thereupon hit upon a compromise in the shape of a dark blue, loose jacket, with silk facings and gold buttons. All his suite adopted the same attire for informal dinners and when the royal tourist returned to Sandringham he did not give up this comfortable garment. It was from this beginning that the dinner jacket of today sprang, and as all its wearers admit, it is a great improvement upon the ordinary swallow-tail.

To the King's sound common sense in matters of everyday life his subjects, and, indeed, the world in general, owe more than most of us imagine. The soft hat, now known as the Alpine, which is such a pleasant contrast to the hard felt, was brought to England from Germany by the King. He noticed a hat of this description in a Homburg shop, bought it and found it so comfortable and becoming that it received the seal of his royal approval, and he has seldom since then been seen in the black bowler, or derby.

The present generation can hardly realize to what lengths the jewelry craze was carried a half a century ago. Men wore yards of watch chain, huge and conspicuous tie pins and diamond studs. Lord Beaconsfield, as a young man, is said to have sometimes had £1,000 worth of gold and precious stones displayed upon his person. The practice led young men into extravagances they could ill afford, and was a direct incentive to thieves. We owe the modest display of masculine jewelry of today particularly to the King, who always sternly discountenanced such foolish extravagances.

Another practice of the middle of the nineteenth centnry was to sit over dinner for at least two hours, while the men usually remained in the dining-room for a still longer period, and frequently drank more port wine than was good for them. The King, though he was always blessed with an excellent appetite, and still enjoys a good dinner as well as any one else, showed his disapproval of these ways as soon as he was settled in Sandringham. He has always liked to smoke immediately after dinner, and so the long sitting over the meal soon became a thing of the past. Then, too, his preference has always been for claret and light wines, so heavy and unwholesome port has been generally reduced from a bottle to a glass a head.

Speaking of smoking, it was the King who popularized cigarettes. He was almost the first person of distinction to smoke them regularly. He took to them in Egypt, and to this day he smokes Egyptian ones only, which are specially made for him by a West End firm.

Rough tweeds, Norfolks and Knickerbockers for shooting are among the boons for which we have further to thank the King. A portrait was taken of him in this costume, with rough worsted stockings and with gun in hand, about thirty years ago. Sportsmen were not slow to follow an example which combined fashion with comfort.

It is well known that His Majesty would like to see a change in the fashion of men's dress, but he shrank from setting a new style, because the velvet coat and breeches and silk stockings which he prefers would probably start an era of ruinous extravagance among the young men of the day. But one pretty innovation in men's evening attire, says Pearson's, we have to thank His Majesty for, besides the dinner jacket. This is the embroidered or silk dress waistcoat, which has enjoyed quite a vogue.

Another sensible garment which the King was the first to wear is the single-breasted frock coat, in which His Majesty first appeared some summers ago. This coat, which is at least as smart as the usual double-breasted coat, has the advantage of being immensely lighter and cooler. The coat was cut to just meet across the chest, and the silk facings reached the extreme edge of the lapels.

Many games and amusements owe their popularity to the King. When a young man he never played cricket or football to any great extent, yet at croquet he was an expert, but voted it slow. Lawn tennis, as we know it today, was invented by Major Wingfield forty years ago, and the Prince—as he was then—immediately declared that it was the best game he had ever seen or indulged in. He was so keen for it that he had a net fitted and "court" laid out on board the "Seraphis" when he voyaged to India. His vote of approval went far to popularize the first outdoor game that has ever brought men and women together on terms of anything like athletic equality. Both cycling, and—more lately—motoring, owe very much to his royal patronage and favor; while for yachting no one man has ever done so much. And last, but not least, King Edward's interest in racing has been most pronounced, and the success that has been his on the British turf is too well known to require repeating.

After a while the apparatus is closed, then resumes its action, then is closed again. Now, to set a metronome in operation and stop it is not a difficult nor a long piece of work, but it is minute and, above all, is not an operation that metronomes are in the habit of doing themselves."

These instances suffice to indicate the sort of manifestations which made a believer in spiritism out of Lombroso the agnostic. The result of his investigations satisfied him, as he warmly recorded in the volume from which I have quoted, that if "in psychical matters we are very far from having attained scientific certainty," nevertheless "the spiritistic hypothesis seems to me like a continent incompletely submerged by the ocean, in which are visible in the distance broad islands raised above the general level, which only in the vision of the scientist are seen to coalesce in one immense and compact body of land, while the shallow mob laughs at the seemingly audacious hypothesis of the geographer."

At the risk of being relegated to the shallow mob, a fearsome fate, I take leave to lag behind the enthusiastic acceptance shown by Lombroso for the Paladino woman. In the first place it was noted by investigators that the levitation of the table did not occur unless the medium's skirt was in contact with one of its legs; and that when she was seated on the weighing-machine, no variation in weight was registered except when the bottom of her dress touched the floor on which the machine stood. But there is more than this to cast doubt upon all the manifestations of Madame Paladino—she has been detected in fraud, not once, but repeatedly. She has been caught, for instance, furtively picking flowers in a garden, with a view to materializing them in the seance room as "apports" brought through the walls in defiance of the laws of space. She has been caught simulating a human face by manipulating her two hands wrapped in a handkerchief to resemble a turban. At Paris, Camille Flammarion obtained almost conclusive evidence that she manipulated the balance of a letter-weigher by means of a hair plucked from her head when she thought no one was observing her; and Dr. Gustave Le Bon satisfied himself that she produced many of her phenomena by deftly withdrawing one of her hands from the grasp of the controller. But it was at Cambridge, England, that the most definite expose was obtained when, after observing her in twenty seances and closely studying her methods, a committee of the Society for Psychical Research gave a detailed report of the various devices which she skillfully used to free herself from the investigators' control, and unanimously declared their belief that "everything was fraudulent from beginning to end."

Lombroso himself admits that Madame Paladino "exhibits both before and during her trance states, a slyness that in some cases goes as far as deception" and yet he gives the stamp of his approval to her work and bases upon it his belief in a future state. Is this not scepticism turned into credulity with a vengeance? Would it not have been more in character for this scientist to conclude, very much as the English investigators did, that unexplained fraud plus defective observation by the sitters, is at the bottom even of the most marvelous and seemingly inexplicable of her feats? That Lombroso's last book is not a satisfying one to the critical reader I hesitate to say on my own humble authority, so I will quote the words of Andrew Lang, an observer who has brought the veriest sang froid to the study of psychic phenomena. Of this book Lang says that it "is one of the worst ever written on psychial research. It was very brave in Lombroso to follow the truth, when he thought he had found it, though it contradicted the opinions of a lifetime. But in his book he proves that he has no idea of what evidence means; he repeats unauthenticated tales of dreams, ghosts, and so on; he very seldom gives a definite and correct reference to his authorities, and his book can only bring his subject into contempt. Less scientific treatment of an important and obscure topic cannot be found outside of "spiritualistic" publications. Seldom has more unscientific work come from a man who had a scientific training."

For those who are not altogether satisfied—and only the credulous will be satisfied—with Lombroso's book, I would recommend the perusal of a little work entitled "Hypnotism and Spiritism" which was published several years ago by Doctor Lapponi, the distinguished physician to Leo XIII. It is a work which corrects many vulgar errors and which brings healthy common sense to the consideration of problems too often veiled in morbid obscurities. Doctor Lapponi speaks of two explanations which have been brought forward by those who refuse to accept the supernatural origin of spiritism and although his book is by no means thetical, he is inclined to see reason for both of them. One party believes that the spirits are the result of illusion, the beholders being more or less hypnotized; the other regards the spirits as out-and-out humbugs, a superior form of the charming and little understood art of prestidigitation. But there are residual phenomena for which neither of these explanations adequately account and the questions evoked by these Doctor Lapponi does not undertake to answer. But these words of his are worthy of pondering: "For the strongest principles of social and individual morality spiritist interviews substitute all sorts of lunacies, endlessly changeful and contradictory. In the case of mediums and in that of those who attend their seances, spiritism yields now an obscuration, now a morbid exaltation of the mental faculties; it leads to serious nervous diseases. Most of the famous mediums and many assiduous runners after seances have died insane or have been stricken with incurable nervous disorders—to say nothing of the still graver dangers against which it is the business of the theologians to put us on our guard. In general, we may affirm that spiritism is always perilous, as well for the body's health as for that of the soul."

It is always possible, of course, that the irreducibility to scientific laws of spiritistic manifestations has been exaggerated. Science may yet find laws to explain the transfers of objects and the materializations, provided always that these manifestations are not the result of collusion or fraud. Unfortunately, experience with mediums in all countries makes this latter proviso necessary. Madame Eusapia Paladino would begin to be above suspicion if she would accept and satisfy the test proposed a generation ago by Sir William Crookes:

"The spiritualist tells of rooms and houses being shaken even to injury by superhuman power. The man of science merely asks for a pendulum to be set vibrating when it is in a glass case and supported on solid masonry. The spiritualist tells of heavy articles of furniture moving from one room to another without human agency. But the man of science has made instruments which will divide an inch into a million parts, and he is justified in doubting the accuracy of the former observations if the same force is powerless to move the index of his instrument one poor degree. The spiritualist tells of flowers with the fresh dew on them, of fruit, and living objects, being carried through closed windows and even through solid brick walls. The scientific investigator naturally asks that an additional weight (if it be only the one-thousandth part of a grain) be deposited on one pan of his balance, when the case is locked."

In other words Sir William Crookes, appreciating the fallibility of the human eye, even when conditions are most favorable for investigation—as they seldom are in the seance room—properly insisted on requiring a test that would not involve close and continuous observation of the medium. Let Eusapia Paladino undergo this test before any more Lombrosos pin their dawning faith to her fragile support.

saves us and should be the basis of our life. We are witnessing today the last convulsions of the dying age, which is based upon violence and not upon love. The time is coming when all will see that these fights, this hatred, and all these institutions founded upon force lead only to our unhappiness. The time is coming when all will see that the one, the simplest, the sole attainable means of salvation, is the means indicated by our consciences; and that is the love which is the ground principle of all our lives.

According to a legend, the Apostle John in extreme old age was obsessed by one feeling which he gave expression to in the words: "Children, love one another!" That was the counsel of a man who had reached the extreme limit of life. It is in that way that the life of man must develop when it reaches a certain stage.

All is simple; all is clear. Man lives—that is, man is born, he grows, matures, decays and dies. Can the object of such a life lie within itself? Surely not. "What is the object?" we ask ourselves. "What am I?" The answer comes: "A being who loves." At first it seems as if man loves only himself. But a short experience of life and a little thought are enough to show that such love has no aim. Whom then shall we love? A man loves his relatives, his friends, all who love him in return. At first that seems to satisfy. But not always. Firstly, these men and women are imperfect; secondly, they change; thirdly, they die. Whom then shall man love? There is but one answer: We must love all, must make love the basis of all, must love God. Man must love not for the sake of the object loved, not for the sake of self, but for the sake of love.

We need but to realize this and the ills vanish out of life and life becomes clear and joyful.

People object: "That would be all right if all men acted in the same way. However, even if I live for love and give to others all, others will live for themselves and for their bodies. What, then, becomes of me, of my family, of all those whom I love and must love? For ages past men have been talking of love, but no man acts as he talks. No man can. We can dedicate our lives to love only if all men do the same—that is, if a miracle transforms the bodily, worldly life of men into a spiritual and a divine life." So speak men in order to quiet their consciences. They know in the depths of their hearts that they are wrong; that their reasoning is false. It is false because a change is needed only in the worldly, bodily life, and not in the spiritual life. Love makes men happy through itself; it makes men happy independently of what other men do, independently of what happens in the world around. Love brings happiness inasmuch as all who love are united with God and demand nothing for themselves, but will give all, even their lives, to others; and find their happiness in this abnegation of self. They are not affected by what others do, by what takes place in the world around. To love means to give oneself to God, to do as God wills. God, however, is love, and wills all good; and he cannot will that those who fulfill his commandments sink to the ground. One who truly loves, therefore, does not perish. But even if, as Christ on the cross, he should perish among men, still death is a joy for him, not the sad and mean death of worldly men. The excuse, therefore, that a man cannot dedicate himself to love because others do not is false and detestable. It is as if a man who must work to nourish himself and his children should cease to work because others do not work.

We must spend our lives in multiplying the love within us, let the world go as it will. By so acting we gain the greatest happiness for self, and do to others all the good that we can.

No man can say whether an undertaking is good or bad if he has not tried it. If we tell a peasant how to sow rye or a beekeeper how to make hives, if he is an intelligent man he will make the experiment and be guided by the result. So it is in life. To find how far the law of love is applicable to life you must test it.

Make the attempt. Promise for a while to follow all the commandments of love. Live so that in your relations with others, even with thieves and drunkards, with superiors or subordinates, you will think of what is best for them, not for yourself. And after you have made the attempt ask yourself: "Was it so difficult? Have I spoiled or bettered my life?" Then decide whether love brings happiness or not. Try it. Instead of returning evil with evil try to return evil with good; to say nothing ill of men; to act kindly even with the ox and the dog. Live thus one day, two days, or more, and compare the state of your mind with its state in former days. Make the attempt, and you will see how the dark, evil modes have passed away, and how the soul's happiness has increased. Make the attempt and you will see that the gospel of love brings not merely profitable words, but the greatest and most desirable of all things.

Auto Notes

L. E. Woodard has recently joined the selling force of the Pioneer Automobile Company and will pay particular attention to selling the Babcock Electric car and the Randolph Truck.

Following out the well established custom of eastern manufacturers of automobiles in holding an annual meeting of Branch Managers for the purpose of outlining the policies for marketing the output of thousands of cars now manufactured in the United States, the Ford Factory recently held a meeting of the Agents and Factory Managers, of this well known car, in Detroit.

Among the recent sales of Ford cars is one by B. B. Brentner, Oakland agent of the Standard Motor Car Company, who delivered a 20 horsepower touring car to E. W. Bowie, a motor enthusiast of Berkeley, who expects to do a great deal of touring during the winter in his new machine. According to Mr. Brentner the transbay cities, including Oakland, Alameda and Berkeley are proving an important factor in the automobile industry of the coming season. The demand for cars in these places is such that he has doubled his allotment of Ford cars for the coming year. "I expect an unusually big season for 1910," said Brentner. "The people are buying cars regardless of price but there is an unusually large demand for medium priced machines such as the Ford and from the inquiries we are receiving from points in the interior of the State I expect a record breaking season next year." Mr. Brentner has received a large shipment of Ford cars from Detroit.

In the comparatively short space of two years a great change has come over the automobile buying public in the matter of demonstrations, according to John H. Eagal, one of the best known automobile men of this city and for several years manager of the automobile department of the Studebaker Bros. "I regard it as quite singular," says Eagal, "that when I began to dispose of automobiles in this territory a few years ago, demonstrations were the thing—that is, more than ninety per cent of prospective purchasers were unwilling to close for their cars until they had taken one or more demonstrations. Apparently the pendulum has swung back in the last two years, until the reverse is true, for not more than ten per cent of the purchasers now request demonstrations. The public possesses a comprehensive knowledge of the machine in question and takes it as an axiom that the car will run. And that practically is all a demonstration yields. Recently we have disposed of more than a score of the new Studebaker '40' cars and I can recall only two demonstrations out of the lot."

E. Powers of Stockton has a Chalmers-Detroit "Forty" that since Sunday couldn't be purchased for the price of a new one. Without preparation, and without even removing the guards, etc., Hackett, a local driver, took his car to the local track and drove it to a signal victory, making one of the miles in 1:05. The race was an Australian pursuit and it took him just three miles to catch his rival that was duly stripped and prepared. What is more remarkable, the car was not overhauled and the engine has not been touched since leaving the factory. The car has been used on the ranch for stacking hay and a recent performance was to haul five tons of raisins to the packing house. It is believed that the time of 1:05 is a new record for a fully equipped car.

D. G. McCarthy, a wealthy mining man and a recent arrival from the Tanana Mining District, Alaska, brings the information that a line of Thomas Flyers has been put on between Fairbanks and the various creek towns in that vicinity, running in opposition to the Tanana Valley Railroad. The new automobile stage line is doing a rushing business; in fact it is actually putting the railroad out of business, as far as the passenger traffic is concerned. The railroad recently made a big reduction in fares but the Thomas line seems to thrive notwithstanding. The auto line is proving a boon in many ways to the miners and business men, as the schedule is so far ahead of the railroad that the saving in time proves a great consideration. Mr. McCarthy intends to spend the winter here and upon his return to Fairbanks in the spring will take a Thomas Flyer with him to use in traveling between his various extensive holdings in the Tanana District.

Another carload of Hudson cars was received recently by the Pioneer Automobile Company and will be delivered at once to waiting customers.

The first seven-passenger touring car to reach the coast from the Buick factory has just been received by the Howard Automobile Company, and is now being displayed at their salesroom in Golden Gate avenue. Following the lines of the other Buick models and finished in very dark blue with cream running gears, the new seven-passenger Buick is a most attractive car. The motor is four cylinders 5x5, developing 50 horsepower. Wheel base 122 inches, 36 inch wheels and three speed selective transmission. The well known high standard of Buick construction is followed in this new creation, and Howard's only regret is that there will be a limited number of the seven-passenger type produced. The few he is able to secure will be entirely taken up within the next few weeks and no more will be obtainable during the entire season.

Letters

"Suzanna and Sue"

Kate Douglas Wiggin's new fall book, "Suzanna and Sue," will have a Shaker community as its setting. There is some probability that her "Rebecca," the best girls' book since the immortal "Little Women," will be given a stage presentation. If the dramatization follows the story even approximately it will be a one part play, and if the playwright can refrain from doing what the author has not done, it will be without sentimental interest, as befits a heroine of the years from ten to sixteen.

A Book From a New Author

Maria Thompson Daviess is a new name in the literary index but her first book is so good that it will pave the welcome way for many more. She introduces us to Miss Selina Lue, another of those optimistic philosophers who keeps her hands so full of work that she has no time for lamentations. She is the special providence of the children of her community, whose cut fingers and bruised heels are adorned with specimens from her rag bag, while some pleasant diversion is devised to take their minds off their troubles before they are fairly launched into a crying spell. She is the proprietor of a little grocery and general store on the River Bluff, with an improvised day home for infants on the side. The babies are called the "soap boxers" from the circumstance that all being yet too small to walk alone, they are held in captivity in a row of empty soap boxes properly cushioned and ranged in the back of the store, out of harm's way. The Flarity twins belong to a motorman on the straggling trolley line whose wife is in the hospital, and are left on the back doorstep in the morning when he goes to his work and reclaimed at nine o'clock at night when his labor is over for the day. Clemmie's father enjoys a good salary but feeling the need of purple socks and other gorgeous raiment for his own adornment, there is not enough to go round, and her mother is forced into that blissful condition of "economic independence" earned by washing dishes at a Woman's Exchange in town. Patty Tyne, the youngest of six, was left behind when her mother, having fitted out the rest of the brood for a visit to relatives, found herself without means or material to devote to the baby, so the little one, with her solitary gingham frock was cheerfully abandoned to better keeping, while the fifth "soap boxer" was a veritable little waif deserted, and duly adopted by Miss Selina Lue, the moving spirit of her small community. The book is full of babies, optimism and unconscious humor, and the warp and woof of it has been embroidered with a very pretty romance. It is a cheerful and entertaining little book. Published by the Bobbs-Merrill Co.

South Sea Stories

"Neath Austral Skies" is another of Louis Becke's entertaining books concerning the South Seats. The contents, short stories, appear to be the gathered threads dropped from the earlier sheafs, and the author has a pleasant way of mentioning names which gives his old time clientage a feeling of comfortable familiarity. Bully Hayes, Paddy Minogue and others may not be drawing room exquisites, but they are flesh and blood—especially blood—and they fit into their surroundings in such manner as to leave no doubt of their reality as individuals. Of the twenty-two chapters which comprise the contents of the volume, nearly half consist of descriptive articles. One in particular, "The Loneliness of it," is almost a sermon preached from the plaint of a young Scotchman who, temperamentally unfitted for the life, yet lured on by the glowing account of a globe-trotting traveler, of the ease in which fortunes accumulated themselves in the South Sea trade, embarked his capital in a venture. Naturally he failed, but the loss of his little fortune, Scotchman though he was, affected him less than "the utter loneliness of the life." In contrast to his misery the author describes his own pleasant sojourn in a far more lonely spot, but, being differently constituted, not bent on making a fortune doing nothing, but alive and alert to the opportunities about him, while no student in the academic sense, he acquired a fund of information on natural history subjects, learned native ways of procuring and preparing food, built and repaired boats, affiliated with the children and found no day too long or too lonely to fill with occupations. It is especially worth while because this same lamentation is the greatest obstacle to every endeavor to break up tenement rookeries and induce people afflicted with the crowd habit to move out into the light. The "country weekers" and Fresh Air Fund beneficiaries have the same objection; it is almost impossible to get domestic help in a suburb, and had not legal ordinances broken up our own refugee colonies they would still be squatting in the parks and resisting every effort to remove them on the plea that to be anywhere that they could not jostle elbows with their neighbors and look into their windows would be "that lonesome." Mr. Becke must be fairly well on in years now, yet he writes "young." It would be a pity to prejudice readers not yet acquainted with him by hinting that he is a "nature writer," but those who enjoy observations and descriptions at first hand, free from scientific tags and labels will find a fund of information in his books. SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 18976, Dept. No. 10.

MRS. KATHERINE SINCLAIR and JOHN WILLIAM SINCLAIR, Jr., Plaintiffs,

vs.

All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California, to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants, Greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Mrs. Katherine Sinclair and John William Sinclair, Jr., plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the Southerly line of Greenwich Street, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-two (122) feet, four (4) inches Westerly from the Westerly line of Scott Street; running thence Westerly and along the said Southerly line of Greenwich Street, fifty-three (53) feet, seven (7) inches; thence at right angles Southerly eighty-two (82) feet; thence at right angles Easterly forty-three (43) feet, two (2) inches; thence Northeasterly fifteen (15) feet; thence Easterly seven (7) feet, eight (8) inches; and thence at right angles Northerly sixty-eight (68) feet, nine (9) inches to the Southerly line of Greenwich Street and the point of commencement.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the Complaint, to-wit: for judgment establishing and quieting said plaintiffs title to all said real property as the owners thereof in fee simple, and determining all adverse claims thereto, and ascertaining and determining all states, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property and every part thereof, and for such other and further relief as may be just and proper in the premises, under and pursuant to the provisions of the Act of the Legislature of California entitled, "An Act to provide for the establishment and quieting of title to real property in case of loss and destruction of public records," approved June 16, 1906.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Court this First day of November, A. D. 1909.

All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California, to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of WILLIAM C. ESPY, sometimes known as W. C. ESPY, and MARY CATHERINE ESPY, his wife, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and county, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, bounded and more particularly described as follows:

Parcel No. 1. Commencing at a point on the Northerly line of "A" Street, distant thereon eighty-two (82) feet six (6) inches Westerly from the Westerly line of Tenth Avenue; running thence Westerly along the said Northerly line of "A" Street twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Northerly one hundred (100) feet; thence at right angles Easterly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles Southerly one hundred (100) feet to the Northerly line of "A" Street and the point of commencement. Being a portion of Outside Lands Block number Two Hundred and Seventy-four (274).

Parcel No. 2. Commencing at a point on the Easterly line of Third Avenue, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet Southerly from the Southerly line of Clement Street; running thence Southerly along said Easterly line of Third Avenue twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Easterly one hundred and twenty (120) feet; thence at right angles Northerly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles Westerly one hundred and twenty (120) feet to the Easterly line of Third Avenue and the point of commencement. Being a portion of Outside Lands Block number One Hundred and Eighty-three (183).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That the above entitled Court make and enter its decree:

1st.—Ascertaining and determining all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description.

2nd.—Establishing and determining the title of plaintiff to said property and that plaintiff be adjudged and decreed to be the owner in fee simple absolute of all of said property.

3rd.—For such other and further relief as to the Court may seem just.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 25th day of September, 1909.

(Seal)

H. I. Mulcrevy, Clerk.
By M. P. Bruton, Deputy Clerk.

The first publication of this summons was made in "Town Talk" newspaper on the 2nd day of October, A. D. 1909.

E. J. HOCKING, Plaintiff,

vs.

LULU W. HOCKING, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to LULU W. HOCKING, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's Desertion; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 6th day of October, A. D. 1909.

"May I help you to alight," said a young man to a lady about to leave he auto.
"No, thanks," said she, "I don't smoke."

Sayings of Young Philosophers

"Freddie, when you said your prayers last night didn't you ask God to make you a good boy?" "Yes, mama." "Well, Freddie, you've been as bad as ever today." "But, mama, you can't blame me if God doesn't do just what I ask Him."

Little Miss Freckels—I made ugly faces at your stuck-up sister the other day, but I guess she didn't see me. Little Johnny—Yes, she did, but she thought they was natural.

Pretty Teacher—Now, Johnny, can you tell me what is meant by a miracle? Johnny—Yes'm. Mother says ef yew don't ketch the new parson it will be a miracle.

Governess—You see, my dear, the Antipodes live on the other side of the earth, and they only go to bed when we are getting up. Little Emma—Then, I suppose my brother Fritz is an Antipode, eh?

"I got kept in today for standing up for Tommy," said Nellie. "Teacher asked Tommy to spell oxen, and Tommy said o-x-o-n, and then she asked me if he was right. I didn't like to go back on Tommy, so I said yes. But she wouldn't believe me."

The nurse was giving the twins a bath. Later, hearing the children laughing in bed, she said: "What are you children laughing about!" "Oh, nothing," replied Edna, "only you gave Edith two baths, and haven't given me any."

Henry Ward Beecher was once addressing a Sunday school on the lesson of the day, which happened to be "Jacob's Ladder." He got along swimmingly until a little urchin in one of the back seats squeaked out, "Why did the angels have to have a ladder when they had wings?" Beecher replied, "Well, that is a fair question. Who can answer it?" There was a pause, and then up went a pudgy fist. "Well, my little man, why was it?" "I guess mebbe they was a-moultin'," was the reply.

Mamma—If you eat any more of that pudding, Tommy, you'll see the bogie-man tonight. Tommy (after a moment's thought)—Well, give me some more. I might as well settle that story once for all.

"Papa, what is a king?" "A king, my child, is a person whose authority is unlimited, whose word is law, and whom everybody obeys." "Papa, is mamma a king?"

A little girl has an uncle who has taught her to open and shut his crush hat. The other evening, however, he appeared with an ordinary silk one. Suddenly he saw the child coming with his new silk hat wrinkled like an accordion. "Oh, uncle," she said, "this one is very hard. I've had to sit on it, but I can't get it more than half shut."

Rarely Disturbed

Two spiders who dwelt in different parts of a church chanced to meet in the aisle one day when out for a constitutional.

"How are you getting on?" said spider No. 1 to spider No. 2.

"Oh, moderately," was the reply; "I don't feel very comfortable on Sundays; I live in the pulpit under the cushion, and on that day the parson comes and bangs the book, and sends his fists on the side, and I have to keep very close, or else some day I think he'll hit me. He bangs with such a force that I know he'll squash me to a jelly."

"Oh, you come and live with me," said his companion. "I'm never troubled; I'm always comfortable, and never disturbed from one year's end to the other."

"Indeed," said the other spider; "and where do you live?"

"Oh, I live in the poor-box," was the reply.

"I beg your pardon. I thought this was Mr. Dingly."

"I am Mr. Dingly."

"Then I am glad to find that I was mistaken in thinking that I was mistaken."

"Hey?"

"I say when I thought I was mistaken I was mistaken in thinking I was mistaken, and, being mistaken in thinking I was mistaken when I wasn't mistaken, I was glad to find I was mistaken when I thought I was mistaken, because I wasn't mistaken; or, rather, I was mistaken when I thought I was mistaken, and so I couldn't have been mistaken. Well, at any rate, I am glad. Looks as if we were going to have rain, doesn't it?"

"Indeed, my love, I'm afraid you'll never see heaven," she said to her husband, who was a newspaper man.

"Don't be alarmed," he replied. "Did you ever know a place I couldn't get a pass to?"

He: "Nellie, just look at that man standing behind me. I don't think I ever saw anyone so plain!"

She: "Hush, dear; you forget yourself!"

The Conspiracy Against Taft

That there is a plot afoot to discredit and crush the Taft Administration and prepare the way for the return to power of the idol of the muckrakers is the opinion of conservative newspapers in touch with affairs at the center of national politics. This conspiracy, we are told, was formed by our spectacular insurgents in Congress in conjunction with certain lean and hungry members of the "Tennis Cabinet," all of whom are incanting lugubriously over an empty pie-wagon and conjuring in the potent name of Roosevelt, ostensibly without the knowledge of that ingenious politician. What has been characterized as the signal gun of the conspiracy was fired through the columns of Collier's yellow weekly, the ammunition being the scurrilous insinuations of one Glavis, who, but a short time ago was expelled from office in disgrace for the mean and contemptible part that he played in the Pinchot-Ballinger controversy. Though to Collier belonged exclusively the right of publication, copies of the Glavis monograph were sent to sympathetic journals in many cities and by them published simultaneously, a circumstance of no little significance. The supposition is that Glavis is but one of many tools who have been employed in furtherance of the deep laid plot against the Taft Administration. There is a promise of more material to come and quickly. Mr. Taft of course is not unconscious of the inspiration of the attitude of certain noisy critics and querulous newspapers, but so far he has been conciliatory and amiable, insisting the while that he is strong in his resolution to carry out the Roosevelt policies. But it is unlikely that he will be able to pursue this course much longer. We may confidently expect to hear something drop before we are much older.

"My Policies" And the Disciples

Solicitude about the Roosevelt policies is an alluring pose, the impressiveness of which cannot be questioned, but the durability of which is another matter. In time the Roosevelt obsession may relax and the people may perceive that what they had cherished as "My Policies" were really nothing more than a personality, and one with feet of clay. But meanwhile, it is to be hoped, they may be able to penetrate the affectation of the political and journalistic demagogues who are trading on Mr. Roosevelt's reputation for aggressive virtue and pretending to be profoundly concerned about the policies which he solicitously bequeathed to his successor. There is no governmental policy of Roosevelt's that is now in any danger of abandonment, but as a result of a radical change in the character and temperament, the habits and methods, of the man who is now President and of his official family, a change has likewise come over the spirit and tone of politics throughout the country, the effect of which has been disheartening to reformers whose specialty is that of vindicating their patriotism by vehemently traducing their neighbors. Naturally reformers of this type are sadly disgruntled. Almost everywhere they have been rebuked and repudiated at the polls. They long for a recrudescence of Rooseveltian reform, for the return of the good old days when Teddy was setting the pace for them; when "undesirable citizens" were the topic of every hour, when "malefactors of great wealth" were being hunted down but never caught, when for the purpose of justifying high crimes and misdemeanors it was but necessary for a politician to affirm himself a reformer intent upon promoting the "greater good." The universal situation of those embittered days was not the result of a statesman's governmental policy; it was the sinister contrivance of an artful politician who had ravished the imagination and perverted the judgment of the hysterical American people. Most sincerely, but nevertheless with that most tenacious of human sentiments which we call selfishness, his disciples mourn his absence and pray for his return to the throne of State.

Roosevelt and the Sugar Trust

In view of the fact that Mr. Roosevelt's claim upon the affections and admiration of his countrymen was based chiefly upon his unquenchable hatred of wrongdoers, the sugar trust scandal, which is now claiming a large share of public attention in the East, must be extremely painful to all men by whom he is held in esteem and veneration. From facts that have been already brought to light it is clear that the attitude of the Roosevelt Administration toward the sugar trust savored strongly of criminal indulgence. But Mr. Roosevelt may be able to give an entirely satisfactory explanation of his curious apathy, for Mr. Roosevelt has wonderful powers of persuasion. He has many formulas for effecting persuasion. The simplest is that which provides for abstention from discussion. He followed this one in the case of Paul Morton who confessed to having rebated for the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe. His favorite formula is that by which he increases the membership of the Ananias Club. This he followed in the case of Judge Parker who charged him with having gathered a huge corruption fund in New York. Mr. Roosevelt pronounced the charge "unqualifiedly and atrociously false," and now though we know it to be true, we still have faith in the invincible moralist. Perhaps this faith cannot be shaken even by the startling revelations that implicate the Roosevelt Administration to such an extent that it has been suggested in terms borrowed from Roosevelt's literary workshop, that we "should follow the trail of graft even though it lead to the White House."

Protected Graft

In the history of frauds against the Government of the United States nothing is to be found half so stupendous or infamous as the system of rascality that was operated by the sugar trust under Mr. Roosevelt's nose, and apparently with the connivance of some of his trusted lieutenants. It is estimated that $30,000,000 that should have gone into the national Treasury was diverted to the coffers of the trust by a species of systematized robbery. For the purpose of defrauding the Treasury the officials of the trust used false weights with the knowledge of debauched officials. The trust has confessed its guilt, but has returned only $2,000,000 of the stolen money. Several officers and directors of the trust are under indictment for violations of the Sherman law, but they have not yet been prosecuted for their larcenous practices. Indeed for these they may never be prosecuted, since owing to Mr. Roosevelt's strange and unaccountable passivity they may be able to plead successfully the statute of limitations. There is urgent demand, however, for a Congressional investigation, which will probably be held, though there will doubtless be powerful opposition from Mr. Roosevelt's friends, who already seem to deem it expedient to draw decayed fish across the trail. They realize of course that in the event of an investigation inquiry will not be confined to the question of loss sustained by the Treasury. Of quite as much importance as the question of loss is the question of official turpitude. We already know that three years before Mr. Roosevelt's term expired the evidence upon which indictments have been found was presented to him. We also know that he did nothing. He was then in the midst of his vociferations against malefactors of great wealth, but the officials of the Sugar Trust who were always generous to the Republican party, escaped his attention. From him the sugar magnates, who were robbing the Treasury by false weights, who were conducting a training school for thieves, debauching not only their own employees but also those of the Government, received no special mark of disesteem. Yet he was not in ignorance of the crimes of the trust. George H. Earle, the man who forced the trust in a civil suit to admit its violation of the law, says that he took the evidence to Washington when Mr. Roosevelt was President, "and could not get him or his Attorney-General, Mr. Bonaparte, to look at it." Special Agent Richard Parr, the man who unearthed the weighing frauds, says that he reported them to Mr. Loeb and that Mr. Loeb talked them over with Mr. Roosevelt, and then told him to go and see Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Armstrong. Thereafter Parr was kept on the move. First he was sent to Boston and then to Portland, Maine, from which city he sent a letter to Mr. Loeb advising him that as the sugar frauds were being committed in New York he was a little too remote from the scene to be able to conduct an efficient investigation. Nevertheless he was kept in the Maine district for several months, and then sent to Cuba. It was not until Mr. Taft came into office that steps were taken to put an end to the frauds and compel the trust to render an account of its iniquities. Attorney-General Wickersham brought suit upon the evidence that was ignored by Roosevelt and Bonaparte and he had no difficulty in procuring indictments. Now as it is generally understood that the paramount Roosevelt policy or rather the most salient of his moral policies, the one that transcends in importance all policies with reference to matters purely of a governmental character, is the punishment of rich malefactors, is it not singular that the newspapers that love the Mighty Hunter for the reputations that he slaughtered with his tongue, have had little or nothing to say about the opportunities he neglected in the glorious heyday of his wild-eyed fury?

Hearst Wants More Liberty

"Imprisonment for criminal libel," says Mr. William R. Hearst, "is a relic of the dark ages." The distinguished editor urges that it be "eliminated from modern penalties," and that newspapers be held responsible for libel only through the medium of the civil courts. "To deprive any citizen of his liberty except when his liberty is a menace to citizenship," says the great exponent of yellow journalism, "is unenlightened and un-American and unworthy of our modern era." From these sentiments it is evident that Mr. Hearst does not place a very high appraisement on reputation. Evidently he regards it as something of less consequence and less value than the smallest member of the human body, for he does not urge that imprisonment for mayhem be "eliminated from modern penalties." To deprive a man of a finger maliciously is a crime, and Mr. Hearst certainly believes that a man who maliciously maimed another by depriving him of even so small a member as the smallest finger on his hand should go to jail, but in his philosophy it is an outrage to imprison an editor for having brutally and wantonly deprived a citizen of what is generally regarded as the purest of treasures and considered by many as dearer than life. But of course Mr. Hearst utters himself from the standpoint of an editor, and his philosophy is somewhat tainted by personal considerations. Unconsciously he reminds us that there are more things than imprisonment for libel that are relics of the dark ages. One of them is the habit of viewing but one side of a question; another is the inclination to create any form of despotism, any kind of tyranny. Mr. Hearst is eager to make the rule of the press absolutely despotic, to put newspaper tyranny beyond the possibility of restraint, and he conceives that the consummation is justifiable because the liberty of the press is essential to the liberty of the people. What he is not able to see, or at any rate what he does not wish to see, is that the liberty which he favors is the kind that easily runs to license. There can be no individual liberty in a country that does not afford sufficient protection to its citizens from the tyranny of a licentious press.

Second-Hand Information

Some weeks ago it was announced that Sir Arthur Conan Doyle had personally investigated the outrages that are alleged to exist in the Congo State and that he intended to write a book about them for the purpose of startling the civilized world and impelling the Powers to interfere in behalf of the poor natives. Now comes the information that the book which is in the hands of a firm of publishers was not written as the result of a personal survey of the Congo country. The popular English novelist has merely correlated the testimony of persons who are said to have witnessed the outrages. The book is full of horrors, but the circumstance is not without significance that Sir Arthur's witnesses are missionaries, British Consuls and traders. They are all very much interested in the rubber industry which, it is said, is accountable for most of the brutalities perpetrated in the Congo country. All of them are persuaded that under British rule the rubber industry would be carried on in a more humane manner, and this is the opinion also of the Congo Reform Association which has headquarters in London, and which is dominated by Missionaries who are probably not much different from the gentlemen whose zeal in spreading the gospel and civilizing the savage has supplied innumerable pretexts for war to all nations that have a passion for expansion. It is doubtless true that the Congo savages are cruelly maltreated and abused by their masters, but which one of the European Powers can truthfully claim that it has never been guilty of similar outrages in the furtherance of colonial policies? And what assurance have we that in the event of interference in West Africa the sufferings of the savages will be mitigated by a more humane policy than that which King Leopold countenances? It is certainly to be hoped that something may be done to alleviate the miseries of the poor natives, but there is nothing in the history of European colonial government to justify the assumption that England or Germany or France will treat them less harshly than they are being treated by the Belgians.

Perspective Impressions

Mr. Roosevelt is coming back to mend his fences.

Thanksgiving comes but once a year—thank God!

President Taft says he "expects great things from the next Congress." There's optimism in every ounce of him.

A man who had never heard of Congress recently applied for citizen papers. Judge Lawlor ought to induce him to join his perpetual venire of professional jurors.

Says Mr. Roosevelt: "Mr. Heney is a man whom all good Americans delight to honor." Which means that the voters of San Francisco are not good Americans. They are undesirable citizens.

Wouldn't it tickle you to death to see a soul-kiss movement on foot?

The Taylor Administration will be remembered for its passionate devotion to the unessentials.

With respect to Alma Bell, if she couldn't keep herself, then her mother ought to have kept her, out of Armes' way.

The unwritten law invoked at Auburn is something that gives young ladies the assurance that they may play with edge tools without getting cut.

If President Taft's coming message to Congress is to be made up of what he didn't say while swinging round the circle it will be a masterpiece of brevity.

Byron's Thyrza Identified

And an Odious Charge Against His Character Disproved by Two New Books Which Reopen a Distasteful Controversy to Show the Great Poet as One of the Faithful Lovers of History

By Robert McTavish

Yet did I love thee to the last,
As fervently as thou
Who didst not change through all the past
And canst not alter now.
The love where Death has set his seal
Nor age can chill, nor rival steal,
Nor falsehood disavow;
And what were worse, thou canst not see
Or wrong, or change, or fault in me.

Yet how much less it were to gain,
Though thou hast left me free,
The loveliest things that still remain
Than thus remember thee!
The all of thine that cannot die
Through dark and dread Eternity
Returns again to me,
And more thy buried love endears
Than aught except its living years.

Thousands of Byronic enthusiasts, reading these and all the other beautiful stanzas which the noble poet addressed to "Thyrza," have puzzled vainly over the identity of the original. Tracking innumerable clues through the multitudinous mazes of Byronic literature they have in most instances found themselves compelled to acknowledge that the secret of Thyrza had been effectually concealed and that the woman of all women upon whom Byron seemed to lavish the greatest strength and the deepest sincerity of his passionate devotion would have to remain a theme for futile speculation.

There have been theories a-plenty to explain the identity of Thyrza, but up to the present they have impressed none but their originators. Now, however, the substance of two books upon Lord Byron supplies an explanation for the Thyrza poems and the personality of their mysterious inspiration which is coherent, plausible and, best of all, creditable to the poet. At the same time this explanation re-opens a controversy which waged about the head of Lord Byron during his lifetime and was revived after his death—a controversy in which the most horrible charges were made against his character. Those who have studied the career and character of Byron in a sympathetic spirit have never believed these charges, but now comes respectable authority to tell us that these charges were false and that their web and woof are inextricably meshed with the threads of the Thyrza story.

It is not pleasant to revivify dead scandals; not pleasant, at least, for any but the coprophilists of literature who gloat over the analysis of decay and make the graveyards of reputation their ghoulish abiding-place. Here is an instance, though, when to recall miserable accusations serves the purpose of helping to refute them, for the Byron scandal was rather buried in silence than quieted with conclusive proof. Byron's admirers were content to judge in charity but his detractors were free to repeat their nasty insinuations.

Foremost among the detractors of the great poet stand, in immortal shame, an American woman and an English lord. The name of the American woman is honored, not only in her native land but in many foreign countries; yet there is an indelible blot upon her fame for which some of us have never forgiven her and never will. I refer to Harriet Beecher Stow. It will be recalled that in 1869 Mrs. Stow, on the authority of Lady Byron, gave to the public certain horrible charges against the character of the dead poet. The world stood aghast at this damnable blackening of the honor of a great man who had no redress, but it was inevitable that some of the infamy charged should defile his memory. With only one of these charges are we concerned here and that, to speak frankly, was the charge of a guilty connection between Byron and his half-sister Augusta Leigh. Incredible as it may seem, it remained for a descendant of Lord Byron to repeat this odious accustation in the hearing of a later generation. Only a few years ago Lord Lovelace, Byron's grandson, produced his infamous "Astarte" in which he sought to substantiate the charge made by Mrs. Stow by means of a letter supposed to have been written by Byron. The authenticity of this letter from which the superscription and the signature have been erased, has never been proved. Its deliberate intent is to suggest the charge to which I have already referred. If Byron wrote it, it could only have been inspired by fiendish hatred of his half-sister Mrs. Leigh and the villainy of its contents may be surmised from the opinion of Andrew Lang that "it is perhaps the most odious expression of a depraved nature that ever was put in writing."

Lovers of Byron who cannot bear to see his name blackened, even by unproved accusations, should welcome the two latest additions to Byronic literature—the "Recollections of a Long Life" by that Lord Broughton who, as John Cam Hobhouse, was one of Byron's dearest friends and "Byron: the Last Phase" by Richard Edgcumbe. A long document regarding Byron's unfortunate marriage was written by Hobhouse in 1816 immediately after the divorce. It was intended as a justification of his friend, to be published in case any attempt were made to fasten upon him the crimes which were not only the common scandal of the day but the unavowed cause of Lady Byron's action. This document is now published for the first time and supplies us with the following facts: In seeking a divorce Lady Byron knew of no statutable grounds which her husband had given her during their year of married life. She was forced, therefore, in applying to the Commons for separation, to place secretly in the hands of her representative whatever evidence she possessed of the odious charge involving Byron and his half-sister as well as of another crime with which we are in nowise concerned. When Byron learned the true nature of the charges made against him he demanded complete legal investigation, but unfortunately for his fame, desisted from this stand when Lady Byron assured him that these charges would not be made part of her allegations in court. Of course Byron suffered for this blunder; his public disgrace in England is a matter of literary history and the revival of the charges at intervals ever since his death would have been impossible if he had completely disproved them at the time of his divorce.

What Byron's defense would have been it is here unnecessary to inquire but as to the truth of the whole unhappy matter, we have from the pen of Mr. Edgcumbe the strongest and clearest light that has ever been shed over this dark literary episode. This writer has rescued Mrs. Leigh from the contamination of the old infamy, but to do this it has been necessary to make her an accessory after the fact of an intrigue which Byron had with that Mary Chaworth whom he loved as a boy. It is an ugly business, of course, but it would be ridiculous for any one engaged in the defense of Byron's character from blacker stains to attempt to free his name from the guilt of adulterous connections. How much hereditary abnormality had to do with the wild deeds of Lord Byron scientists have loved to speculate. Byron's mother was a Gordon of Gight and students of Scottish history tell us that, for several generations, the ferocious wickedness of the Gordons of Gight had been an unique phenomenon

Vagabond and Poet

By A. Le Hetre (From the French)

"What time is it, Bastide, my good clerk?"

"Five minutes of two, judge."

"Let us enjoy those five minutes, Bastide! It is so hot! Who owns those tomatoes upon the windowsill?"

"Those are some fruits of my garden, sir. This morning I pulled up one of my plants by mistake, the finest of them all, the one I had saved from the insects; and so I brought my poor tomatoes here, so that they might ripen. It must be owned that monsieur the judge's room is so freely exposed to the sun—"

"That it seems made expressly to ripen your love-apples! You are right, Bastide. What the deuce are we going to have today? Some fine domestic drama?"

"Alas! sir, nothing but a simple vagabond, but we must not be disheartened."

"I still hope, Bastide, I still hope! In the meantime let us examine Jean Clochepin, vagabond by trade. A vagabond! Good heavens, what a trade, and in such weather! Go and bring in this heroic man; it will be a charity to put him in the shade."

The judge let his arms fall down along the sides of his chair. He had laid his cigarette close to his pen-rack; there rose from it a fine, silky smoke—a dainty keepsake from some invisible fairy's hand.

The judge saw in front of him, through the wide open window, the dazzling blue sky of this July afternoon, and the light tower of the college, which sprang up like a rosy stalk. A bee, who had rested upon a tomato that had burst open with a juicy laugh, bore away with his humming a faint echo of the snoring of the drowsy town.

At the same hour the sergeant and the substitute whom he had picked up dozed over their beer at the Cafe Tivoli. The professor of mathematics went back to his classes after having repeated to Mme. Graubjac, the matron, for the thousandth time, as he himself said, that her profile was growing more and more Grecian. The judge addressed verses to this matron, madrigals and sonnets, wherein he lamented her hard-heartedness. All this, however, was merely after-dinner playfulness. The judge loved poetry, practised the religion of figures and rhythms, and in his court this was his only consolation and the secret of his even temper.

Weariness fell from the city walls with the gray dust of the plaster. The evening, with its quiet hours, was coming, when those good, motherly voices in the bell-towers would counsel folks to go to sleep. The judge longed to escape to some calm retreat—with a book of verses.

"Move on there! Quicker than that, you!"

The magistrate drew himself up. In front of him, under Buzenat the gendarme's black eye, and preceded by the clerk Bastide, the vagabond entered; a tall, slouching body, bearded, and very hot. He had taken off his rusty felt hat, which looked like a mushroom. Two sea-green eyes shone upon his bushy eyebrows, and his solidly planted nose bestrode his red mustache. His beard foamed and flamed. He was dressed in an old suit of gray clothes, the color of the roads.

The judge inspected his man with a glance. Then he let him approach without looking at him, affecting to be occupied with his papers and with the reports of the officers. This carelessness in regard to prisoners was the judge's favorite procedure.

He suddenly raised his head, looked at the man, and asked:

"Your name?"

"Jean Clochepin, monsieur the judge, at your service."

"Thanks!" said the magistrate scornfully. "Jean Clochepin, you have already had dealings with the courts."

"That is true," said the vagabond, bowing his head.

"You need not flatter yourself upon that account," said the judge. "For some days your movements have thrown the peaceful hamlet of Saint-Pierre-le-Fenille into a state of terror. You must have threatened the people or the corps, either by gesture or by words, or else the men would not have driven you away with pitch-forks and pointed you out to the police."

The vagabond replied in a calm voice: "Pointing out their field to them, I said to three peasants who refused me a piece of brown bread: 'Still, you have fine rye this year!' There was no anger in my gesture or my words. That field, monsieur the judge, was very beautiful. I love the dusty green of the rye. The ladies whom I saw last year all wore that shade of green."

"Crac, cric, crac," went the clerk's impatient pen. One might have thought that it was a cricket learning to chirp. The judge bent down toward the worthy officer:

"It is needless to write anything, Bastide. Do not fatigue yourself."

Then, returning to Jean Clochepin:

"As to the ladies," he said, "you addressed unsuitable words to a young woman of Peyrilles, near the fountain. It was in the evening toward nine o'clock, fifteen or twenty minutes past nine—this print is not very clear. Nobody knows what might have happened if Grateloup, the postman, had not chanced to pass that way."

"It is possible, monsieur the judge, that I may have spoken some words of harmless gallantry to this woman, who seemed very pretty to me, and who bore upon her head, with antique grace, an old copper pail adorned with flowers. But I can assure you that my words were in no-wise disrespectful. Vagabonds, monsieur the judge, look at young women as at the blue sky of our land; they look with joy, but without hope."

"A queer, good fellow!" murmured the judge, who had been regarding Jean Clochepin with interest. "A queer, good fellow, indeed—but perhaps one ought to be distrustful. The gay chap may be a rascal. Let us be wary!"

The vagabond was getting ready to talk. The judge checked him with a gesture:

"Have you any papers?"

"Yes, monsieur the judge."

He placed a dogwood stick against the table and drew from his waistcoat a thick, fawn-colored pocket-book, frayed, worn, full of folds and pockets, crammed with papers and plants, bulging like a poacher's game-bag.

"Give me that."

The judge took the pocket-book with a sudden movement, opened it upon the table, unfolded it, spread it out. There were ferns in it, pressed flowers, some blue or faded rose-color on a pale yellow background.

"Why, this is a herbarium!" said the magistrate. "Wait, here are some pages!"

The judge had come to a dead stop. He was reading. Somber at first, his face began to brighten. The judge swayed his head back and forth, with half-open mouth.

"Is this your own?"

"Yes, monsieur the judge," the vagabond owned, embarrassed. "You know how it is! The length of the roads, the loneliness of the inns, the open air, the smell of the meadows, the adventures—"

The judge bent upon Jean Clochepin a face full of kindness.

"Will you leave me one of your poems?"

"If it pleases you, monsieur."

The judge glanced round the room: Buzenat, the gendarme, was stealthily drawing near the tomatoes; full, round-cheeked, swollen with rich juice, they temptingly diffused a warm and piquant fragrance in a wave of sunlight. Bastide, the clerk, his head upon his arms, was slumbering, a pleasant smile upon his lips.

The magistrate quickly drew from his pocket a five franc piece and put it into the vagabond's hand. The latter, having seen the movement, looked as if he would refuse the gift.

"It is the price of the verses," murmured the judge. "You are free."

And, rising, he himself opened the door for Jean Clochepin, vagabond and poet.

A Vigia

By R. B. Cunninghame Graham

When the old Spanish navigators, sailing in virgin seas, uncharted, undeflowered by keels, passed by some islet about which they were doubtful, seeing it dimly as the mist lifted for a moment, or in the uncertain light of the false dawn, they called it a Vigia, a place to be looked out for, and their old charts are dotted here and there with the Vigia of the Holy Spirit, the Trinity, the Immaculate Conception, or the Exaltation of the Cross.

Their followers, sailing with ampler knowledge but less faith, kept a look-out for the mysterious shoals or islets, not often finding them, unless they chanced to run upon them in the dark and perish with all hands. These were Vigias of the seas, but there exist Vigias of the mind, as shadowy and as illusive, to the full, as any that Magellan, Juan de la Cosa, or Sebastian Cabot marked upon their charts. We all know of such islands, low lying, almost awash, as it were, in the currents of the mind. On them we make our land-fall when we choose, without a pilot, except memory, to guide us in the darkest night. We land and roam about alone, always alone, for those who once inhabited them and welcomed us whenever we sailed in, are now all harbored. Commonly we stay but little there, for though the men we knew are dead, their ghosts so jostle us that we are glad once more to re-embark and sail again into a world of noise, that modern anaesthetic of the mind, still knowing that one day we must return and swell the shadowy procession that walks along the shores of their dead, saltless seas. There is an island, whose whereabouts I do not care precisely to reveal, although only a little strait divides it from a land of mist, of money-making, a land of faiths harder by far than facts, and yet, there it rides swaying on the sea like some great, prehistoric ship, looking out westward in the flesh, and with the interior vision straining its eyes to keep its recollection of the past fresh and undimmed. Green grass, white sands, limpid blue seas, with windows here and there of palest green in them, through which you look into the depths and count the stones, watch sea anemones unfold like flowers, and follow the minutest fish at play fathoms below your boat; these keep it fresh, old and uncontaminated. One likes to think of virgin souls, and so I like to think of this oasis in the desert of the sea as virgin, in spite of tourists, steamboats and the stream of those who go to worship and defile. They have the power to trample down the grass, to leave their sandwich papers and their broken bottles in the ling, but the fresh wind coming across a thousand leagues of sea eludes them. That they can never trample down. So may a woman in a brothel be the mattress of the vilest of mankind and keep some corner of the soul still pure; for it is dull, befitting only to the spirit of the so-called wise, to say the age of miracles is dead. Those who have kept their minds unclogged with knowledge know that they never cease.

So old my island is that it seems young—that is, it still preserves an air as of an older world, in which men labored naturally just as a bee makes honey; a world where the chief occupation of mankind was to look round them as the Creator did in Eden and to find all things good. So they pass all the morning, meeting their fellows and saluting them, and in the afternoon re-pass and re-salute, then work a little in the fields, lifting up hay upon a fork with as much effort as an athlete in a circus raises a cannon in his teeth, till it is time to sit down on a stone and watch the fishing-boats return upon the tides, the steersman sitting on the gunwale with his knee jammed against the tiller, and the sheet firmly knotted round a thwart. Just as of Avila, it might be said of my Vigia, that it is all made up of saints and stones, for not a stone is without its corresponding saint or saint without his stone. Thus in both places does the past so dwarf the present, that things which happened when the world was young seem just as probable as the incredible events we see before our eyes.

Upon a mound that looks out on a landlocked bay the heathen crucified some of the new faith a thousand years ago, bringing as we might think their crosses with them ready made or rigging up a jury cross, fashioned from spars and oars, for not a tree grows, or has ever grown, upon the island where now the sheep feed peacefully on the short, wiry grass broken with clumps of flags. A little further on fairies appeared the other day, not to a man herding his sheep and dazed with solitude, but to a company of men who all declare they saw the Little People seated upon a mound. Fairies and martyrs both seem as natural as does the steamer landing its daily batch of tourists to hurry through the street where the kings sleep under their sculptured stones, gaze at the Keltic crosses and the grey, time-swept church which lies a little listed, as it were, to starboard, upon the grassy slope where once there stood the wattled temple of the Apostle of the Isles. The mud-built church, where the Apostle chanted his last Mass, is nearer to us than the cathedral, now being killed with care. We see the saint lie dying, and his white, faithful horse approach and make its moan and, bowing down its head, ask for his blessing, as is recorded by the chronicler, with that old, cheerful faith in the impossible that kept his world so young.

So standing on the Capitol, the Church, Popes, Cardinals and Saints, the glory of the Middle Ages, the empire, the republic and the kings, melt into mist and leave us, still holding, as our one sure possession, to the two children suckled by the wolf. Some men, like Ponce de Leon, have sailed to find the fountain of eternal youth, landed upon some flowery land, left it, and died still searching, all unaware the object of their quest, had it been found, would have left paradise a waste. There in my island, whose longitude and latitude, for reasons of my own, I keep a secret, there is, I think, some fountain in which those who bathe recover, not their youth, but the world's youth, and ever afterwards have their ears opened to the voices of the dead.

So, seated on the ground amongst the flowers that grow in miniature amongst the grass, bedstraw and tormentil, upon the cairn-topped hill from which the saint of Gartan saw his vision, they see the history of the isle acted before them, as in an optic mirror of the mind. The setting still remains just as it was when the Summer Sailors from the north fell on the peaceful monks one day in June, twelve hundred years ago, and sacrificed them and their prior to their offended gods. The thin, white road which cuts the level machar into

Once Upon a Time

By Hans Winand

Once upon a time there was a young woman and she wandered through the beautiful world, looking about her with her big beautiful eyes. She was seeking happiness.

Then a poet met her.

"Do you possess happiness?" she asked him.

He took her into his realm and gave her all his treasures, proud, lofty castles and purple garments. He showed her the glories of the sunrise and the splendors of the sunset and then he placed a little gold crown on her head.

"What else am I to have?" she asked after a while.

"I have given you my all," he answered sadly.

"All?" said she surprised, and departed to seek happiness elsewhere.

Then she was met by a tall man with a great red beard and blue eyes.

"Do you possess happiness?" she asked him.

"Yes and no," said he and kissed her. So she went with him, and whenever she asked about happiness he kissed her again, saying, "Yes and no." And at the same time he smiled mysteriously.

Her thoughts dwelt upon the answer and she remained with him always, waiting for him to give her happiness. But the man always answered by a kiss and a smile.

The Spectator

Burgess Satirizes Society

One of the most amusing parts of Gellett Burgess' new book, "Lady Mechante" is that which describes how the fantastic heroine introduces the Cave Man, in the person of a coal heaver, into society. As a vehicle for satire the situation is not a new one; Moliere used it in Les Precieuses Ridicules and Smollett, with a clumsier touch, made it one of the prime escapades of his inimitable Peregrine Pickle. The idea lends itself to clever usage in widely separated decades and it is certain that Burgess will not be the last to adopt it. In his characteristic mode of airy irresponsibility the goop man has constructed a series of amusing scenes with Lady Mechante and the Cave Man as their central figures and needless to say, the satire is at times biting and pointed straight at recognizable persons. The introduction of a coal heaver into polite circles is Lady Mechante's crowning achievement and enables Burgess to decorate the conclusion of his fantasy with the approved romantic trimmings. The manner in which Lady Mechante captures the Cave Man is in itself mighty good reading, but it is when she has groomed him and provided him with the cant literary phrases and art jargon that are accepted without question in society that the heroine, under the deft manipulation of Burgess, strikes her best pace.

Smagg, The Cave Man

That Lady Mechante undertook no child's work when she set about the polishing of her rough diamond may be inferred from the following description: "Haulick Smagg, his eyes fixed upon the ground, his coal shovel over his shoulder, heaved his six feet of bulk stolidly across Madison Square, walking as heavily as a dray horse. Below his eyes the rest of his face was lost in the melange of dirt, hair and matted whiskers, all save two great ears, one on each side of his skull, poised winglike, as if for flight. His carnivorous jaw worked ponderously upon a cud of tobacco; his left arm swung back and forth like a piece of crude machinery. His dress was nondescript, blackened to a homogeneous filthiness by the pasty soot." For one hundred dollars Smagg was induced to lend himself to the experiment with society and for another hundred he agreed to call at the studio of Dolly Van Dream in Highbrow Hall and narrate his experiences. When Smagg presented himself, in his coal heaving outfit, at the apartment of Lady Mechante in the Flatiron Building, that lady greeted him "as if he had been a long-lost friend. Then she went to the telephone and called up the tonsorial establishment on the eleventh floor. 'Send two big barbers,' she commanded, 'with soap and towels, razors, scissors, combs, a quart of violet water and a ton of energy. I pay by the hour.'"

The Transformation of Smagg

The next scene opens in Highbrow Hall, "a huge sponge in whose multitudinous honeycombs are housed the maddest artists and literary cranks in the city of New York. It is the abode of a thousand freaks." It is the hour of tea and "a precious poet or two, and perhaps a painter" are Dolly Van Dream's guests. Haulick Smagg enters in an uncomfortable frock coat and a pair of large varnished boots. He confides to Dolly that Lady Mechante has taught him the principal phrases and pass-words of swagger New York society. Dolly immediately introduced him to Mr. Lilliput, the minor poet. Smagg absent-mindedly gulped down two cups of tea to gain time. Then, infused with desperate courage, he looked around at the pictures. Singling out a landscape, an impressionistic mosaic of colored dabs, he thrust out his thumb and wiggled it with a technical gesture. "Lots of bully good stuff in that!" he muttered, sagaciously. "I like this part in here"—lunging out with his thumb at any old part. "A bit tricky, though." This put him in right, so that he next boldly tackled a still-life study—a dead fish, three onions and a dishpan—and said, striking an oracular attitude: "Good—but why do it?" This scored a bull's-eye. Smagg, dazed by his success as an art critic, could not resist the temptation to work off a few other trifles which Lady Mechante and Dolly had put him wise to. "The worst thing about blank verse is that it's usually so damned blank." This frightened the minor poet, so at a hint from Dolly, Mr. Smagg made a left-handed apology in these words, provided beforehand by Lady Mechante: "Miss Van Dream, I have associated so long with the lower classes, in search of material, you know, that really I am forgetting how to behave. What?"

The Cave Man Drops Into Poetry

It was the natural result of his environment that Smagg should become a poet, but when Lady Mechante asked him about the character of his poetical efforts, he responded with the following patter: "How can I do it? How can anybody do it that's decent? Poetry is the language of feeling, ain't it? You can't put it into words. Even them pictures of mine don't put it into words; no more does music. Nobody means what they say when they write lyrics; if they did, they ought to be ashamed of themselves. When you have a feeling that's poetic, it's like having a woman you're in love with. No man as is a man wants to go to work and expose it for everybody to stare at. If a poet came to see me I'd kick him downstairs and then go and wipe my shoes on the mat! All the same I'll give it to you if you want to hear it; but you understand that it's something sacred and holy; it's a part of the mystery of my own being; it's like a love-letter, I expect; it's the sort of thing one doesn't confess." The reading brought tears to Lady Mechante's eyes. It is evident that the Cave Man found little difficulty in acquiring the slang of polite criticism. There is much in this portion of Burgess' satire which is calculated to make the sulphites wince.

A Touching Love Scene

Smagg's social experiences were too much even for the brute strength of a coal heaver and he went to the hospital with nervous prostration. When he emerged Dolly Van Dream confessed her love for him but he repulsed her. "You'd accept me, would you?" he thundered. "Well, I wouldn't marry you, you broom-haired doll, for a ton of coal. When I want a wife I'll get something besides a corset and a lot of false hair and a visiting card." Then it was Lady Mechante's turn. "Now that we are alone," she murmured, "you may kiss me. Kiss me like a cave man, Haulick, if you will; kiss me as I've never been kissed before. Then take me by the hair of my head and drag me into your cave." When Haulick had acted on this agreeable suggestion, Lady Mechante murmured: "From the partial impact of two dead stars new worlds are born."

The man had been arrested for stealing an umbrella.

"What have you to say for yourself?" asked the magistrate. "Are you guilty or not guilty?"

"I'm one o' the guilty ones, y'r honor, I reckon," answered the prisoner. "The umbrella had the name of X. Thompson on the handle, G. Z. Brickley stamped on the inside o' the cover ,an' I stole it from a man named Quipley."

In Defense of Mr. Phelan

From the most casual inspection of the daily prints one must perceive that considerable talent is being expended in the lampooning and deriding of that eminent citizen, the Hon. James Duval Phelan. The indications are that a conspiracy has been formed to derogate from his dignity by means of biting jests and strokes of raillery. At every turn he is being held up to ridicule and exposed to the coarse laughter of the ribald multitude. Fortunately Mr. Phelan has a thick hide. It is not easily to be penetrated. Though round his dapper form there is playing a flame of satirical wit I am sure it will flicker and expire against the incombustible sanctuary of his buoyant conceit. But while Mr. Phelan is not to be

It will be noticed that these four opera-goers are not entirely enthralled by the performance. In fact none of them is looking at the stage. overwhelmed by ridicule, while the callousness of his person is proof against the barbed shafts and poisoned darts of satire, nevertheless in the interest of truth his critics ought to be admonished to refrain from puerile misrepresentation. I have in mind the Call's retort with reference to the iron dogs and other metallic effigies that contributed realism to the artificial landscape adjacent to the Phelan home in Valencia street. Mr. Phelan having affirmed that the Camino Real bells were not "good enough for the chief city of the State," the Call took occasion to sneer at "Mr. Phelan's statuary on exhibition in his spacious lawn." Now as a matter of fact Mr. Phelan was not the owner of that junk. The old Phelan homestead was not bequeathed to him. It was only his nominal residence, and he never visited it without experiencing poignant emotion at sight of the domestic animals in pot metal that seemed to stare at him reproachfully whenever he put in an appearance. The original owner of those dogs and deer, by the way, was Frank McCoppin, the "father" of Golden Gate Park from whom the property in Valencia street was purchased by the founder of the Phelan fortune. Whether the artistic taste of Phelan senior ever revolted at the garden statuary I do not know, but I recall that many years ago Arthur McEwen related in a local newspaper that one day the owner of the property in a rage at the iron effigies for not paying ground rent knocked over every one of them with a club.

He's Wedded to the Conventional

Mr. Phelan's criticism of the Camino Real bells ought to be taken seriously if for no other purpose than to encourage edifying and instructive controversy. Doubtless the ladies who are responsible for the perpendicular freaks are able to vindicate their faith in them. Now it might be in the nature of a liberal education in decorative art to hear what they have to say in justification of the things they have erected upon the highway. Let it not be supposed that Mr. Phelan's word is final in such matters. True Mr. Phelan is an art critic. He has traveled much and he has seen the masterpieces of the world's greatest geniuses from Praxiteles to his favorite sculptor, Douglass Tilden. He has himself bought statuary and paintings, and he has expatiated learnedly on their merits, but his ideal in art is the conventional ideal. He recognizes no type of beauty but that which the Greeks gave us. His standard of facial beauty is that of the Venus of Milo. He worships but one esthetic type. Chinese dragons and Japanese gods do not appeal to him, for he has not been educated in Oriental art. He is ignorant of the revolt that took place in the Middle Ages against Greek estheticism. He sees no beauty in Gothic gargoyles. In short he has no taste for the grotesque, which though essentially ugly is none the less artistic. Hence his aversion to the Camino Real bells which are nothing if not ugly and they are certainly that.

The Value of Him

To me it seems not only ungenerous but in subversion of our own interest to subject Mr. Phelan to ridicule for constituting himself the art censor of our beloved city, which we are passionately desirous of making beautiful. Ridicule is rightly employed to laugh men out of vice and folly, not to discourage them in the performance of public service. A community of Philistines as we are we need somebody versed in the philosophy of the decorative arts to wield a refining rod for testing the value of every work designed for public use; to differentiate the true from the false, the good from the bad, the beautiful from the banal, the simplicity of a masterpiece from the vulgarity of brummagem. Why not the Hon. James Duval Phelan for the job? Mr. Phelan is a connoisseur in much that pertains to esthetic endeavor. He has an eye as alert for defects in works of art as in the character of his fellow-men, and as he is the victim of a tormenting craving to astonish with his culture his propensity to discover shortcomings entitles him to claim direct descent from that celebrated deity described by Swift, whose abode was on the top of a snowy mountain in Nova Zembla. Now as Mr. Phelan's favorite occupation, that of censor of public morals, is gone, let us not fleer him into the background; let us prefer to make use of him in the capacity of first aid to the City Beautiful. We should be glad to avail ourselves of the service of a man of his leisure and culture; but whatever be our inclination in the matter, the probability is that Mr. Phelan will attend to our wants as he sees them and without consulting our wishes. He is too public spirited to suffer the city to drift aimlessly. He must and will be the champion of something, if it be nothing more important than his own vanity. His mission is to find fault, a miserable one perhaps, but like the hangman's it is of benefit to society; it serves to correct errors and reform abuses.

How Wheeler Bored the Germans

Dr. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, President of the University of California and holder of the Roosevelt professorship at the Berlin University for this year, delivered his introductory lecture at that institution some weeks ago. The subject was "The Power of Public Opinion in America." Of this we have been informed by the press despatches; also that among those present were the Kaiser and the Empress, who are said to have been deeply impressed by the distinguished savant from the academic groves of the Berkeley foothills. This report does not coincide with reports from private sources. In the haunts of scholars where the lecture has been discussed over foaming tankards and at the end of long pipes, Professor Wheeler is reported to have made himself ridiculous by assuming that the educated people of Germany are in absolute ignorance of conditions in this country and especially of the salient features of democracy under our Republican institution. The fact is that Professor Wheeler's lecture clearly illustrates the evil effect of carrying out his theory of the essentials of a university educational system. He has made it clear that he is as provincial as the system which he advocates. He is the victim of his own philosophy. His lecture on "The Power of Public Opinion in America" is nothing more than a rehash of a few chapters of De Tocqueville's standard work on "Democracy in America." With this work the scholars of every civilized country in the world are familiar; it has been translated into all languages, and it has been read by everybody who has made any study of the science of government; but Dr. Wheeler in the blind folly of his provincialism, assumed that literature dealing with this country is of interest only to Americans, and went all the way to Germany with an assortment of moss-covered information which he unloaded under the misapprehension that it was bound to be received as something in the nature of an apocalypse. And of course the professors of the Berlin University were bored into a state of coma.

The Professor's Obtuseness

Copious excerpts from Professor Wheeler's lecture have come to me, and from them I find that he presented a picture of conditions in this country that is not at all flattering and that must have astonished the Germans notwithstanding their familiarity with De Tocqueville; for while the Frenchman pointed out that the despotism of public opinion was the thing to be dreaded in this country, Professor Wheeler seems to be entirely oblivious of its evil consequences. If not oblivious Professor Wheeler is at least singularly obtuse. The difference between De Tocqueville and Wheeler is that the former passes judgment on our institutions, giving his reasons therefor, while the man from Berkeley merely presents the facts without drawing any conclusions. But at the same time Professor Wheeler apparently approves what was abhorrent to De Tocqueville and what must be shocking to all men of sound judgment and good morals. This peculiarity of Wheeler's astounded the scholarly men that listened to him in Berlin.

The Effect of Public Opinion

Professor Wheeler opens his Berlin lecture with the statement, which is to be found in De Tocqueville, that "the origin of all power in the United States is public opinion," and that "once it is stirred up and becomes clearly conscious of its destiny no statesman dares to withstand it." He adds, "Consequently the American politician is glad to devote all his astuteness and his best powers of judgment to divining and calculating the direction which public opinion might conceivably take and to using his utmost skill and strength in organizing the political machinery of the parties"; also, "Few have time, inclination or strength to work out and introduce new political measures; they are too much engaged in following the fluctuations of public opinion to find leisure for that task, and in the constant attempt to adapt themselves to these fluctuations they have become too pliable to have strength enough to work out and introduce new political measures." Is this not a graceful and vivid picture of a nation ruled by demagogues? It is certainly true to life, but does Professor Wheeler view it with disfavor? Not at all. On the contrary, he points to it with pride, much of course to the amazement of German scholars. Here's another picture: "Public opinion and not the electoral convention prepares and dictates the program or, if not public opinion at least that which the leaders take for it at the time. Where public opinion is not to be mistaken the program uses bold language; where it is divided, one part of the country against the other, the program is silent; where it is unclear and therefore wavering the program is ambiguous." All of which is certainly true. Hypocrisy, dissimulation and moral cowardice are the products of democracy in the United States, and public opinion is acquiescent. Furthermore our university professors who are supposed to do something toward educating and informing that public opinion, which is the origin of all power in the United States are unconscious of the evil of the situation which one of them so eloquently described in Berlin.

The Import of His Message

The logical deduction from Professor Wheeler's observations is that public opinion in this country has a most pernicious effect on public life. He does not argue that such is its effect, but the conclusion is obvious and not to be evaded, though possibly the distinguished lecturer is unconscious of the precise import of his trite message to the Germans. It is charitable to suppose that he did not perceive all that was implied in his remarks, that he was nodding more than usual when he regaled the Germans with gossip about the weaknesses of the institutions of his country, the intellectual dishonesty of its statesmen and the incredible gullibility of the masses. It must have been through inadvertence that he told such things as are conclusive of the tendency of participation in public affairs in this country toward the development of insincerity and selfishness. But assuredly our politicians, if what Professor Wheeler says is true—and I have no reason to question his veracity—are animated not by a praiseworthy sense of devotion to the public good but by greed of office. This is of course a lamentable state of affairs. The examples of statesmen as Professor Wheeler knows ought to be among the most precious and indestructible inheritances of a nation. But our statesmen, according to Professor Wheeler, give us nothing but bad examples, for they spend all their time conciliating the general; they are incessantly engaged in a pot-house squabble; they cultivate the arts of the charlatan, and practice the wiles of the hypocrite. A severe indictment is this which Professor Wheeler has drawn. It implies that the statesmen of this age have ceased to habituate the general mind to models of excellence in conduct. It indirectly affirms that out of this country has evanished that dignified and heroic ideal of devotion to the public weal which in the days of Washington and Franklin was evidenced by abnegation of self and the constant preference of a broad and ultimate good to local expedients and temporary triumphs. But why doesn't Professor Wheeler preach his message in his native land, and try to educate the mob out of the ignorance of its ways. I hope it is not because he is afraid of public opinion.

A Sinister Eulogy

That Professor Wheeler really approves the great American practice of mob-coddling I infer from what he said in Berlin regarding the idol of his heart, the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt. As might have been expected the sentiment of gratitude prompted him to pay tribute to the genius and worth of the statesmen who made his appearance in Berlin possible. This is what he said: "He (Roosevelt) holds the hearts of the American people as no man before him because he understands public opinion." I am informed that several old dry-as-dust professors exploded with laughter and were threatened with asphyxiation when the Berkeley savant handed out this remarkable piece of equivocal eulogy.

"What does he mean?" asked one of them as he emerged from his spasm.

"He means," said his neighbor, "that where Demos reigns Theodore Roosevelt is his prophet."

As De Tocqueville Saw Us

As it has been charged that Wheeler's lecture is a rehash of De Tocqueville let us consult the great French philosopher and see wherein his observations coincide with those of the man from Berkeley. "Although," said De Tocqueville, "the form of government in America is representative it is evident that the opinions, the prejudices, the interests and even the passions of the community are hindered by no durable obstacles from exercising a perpetual influence on society." This he characterized as the "despotism of the majority" and he attributed to it "the paucity of distinguished men in political life." In other words the necessity of coddling the mob restrained men of superior character from entering political life, and our government was in the hands of such men as Professor Wheeler describes, men who are so busy following the fluctuations of public opinion that they have no time for anything else; in short demagogues like Roosevelt who make it their business to understand Demos. "In that universal crowd which throngs the avenues to power in the United States," says De Tocqueville, "I found very few men who displayed any of that manly candor and that masculine independence of opinion which constitute the leading features in distinguished characters wheresoever they may be found." What he found of course were men skilled in the art of drawing platforms after the manner expatiated upon by the gentleman who holds the Roosevelt professorship. While Professor Wheeler discussed at considerable length the eager deference paid by politicians to public opinion he discreetly refrained from saying anything about the flattering of the mob by artful coddlers. This is what De Tocqueville said on the subject: "They are forever talking of the natural intelligence of the populace they serve . . . . Before venturing upon a harsh truth they say: 'We are aware that the people which we are addressing is too superior to all the weaknesses of human nature to lose the command of its temper for an instant; we should not hold this language if we were not speaking to men whom their virtues and their intelligence render more worthy of freedom than all the rest of the world.' It would have been impossible for the sycophants of Louis XIV to flatter more dexterously." From all of which it is clear enough why the scholars of Berlin who are familiar with De Tocqueville were bored by Wheeler.

"Herr Meyer, after his cashier had run away with his wife, engaged a woman cashier."

"Yes, and what then?"

"Now he has run away with the woman cashier."

The Verses of a Clubman

Edmond Frank Green is a man of varied activities. He has practiced law and dallied with the brokerage business, he is credited with a large share in the introduction of the beguiling slot machine into this city and he belongs to the Bohemian Club, an affiliation which some of our serious clubsters regard as a tremendous career all by itself. But the list of Green's activities has not been exhausted; it remains to be said that he is a writer of verses. I have heard the sacrosanct word "poet" coupled with the name of E. F. Green, but I will not go that far. While I do not insist that a poet possess the tremendous equipment set forth by Dr. Johnson in Rasselas'. I am still old-fashioned enough to believe the Horatian dictum and I submit, in all sincerity and with no wish to carp, that Mr. Green was not born to the bays. I imagine that no honey bees swarmed about his cradle as about that of the mellifluous Anacreon. I think it unlikely that as a child, unknown to fame and the Bohemian Club, he lisped in numbers and the numbers came. I doubt whether an irresistible impulse drove him to the composition of an epic before his eighth tender year. I cannot find it within me to believe that while still in his nurse's arms, he wept at the sad spectacle of a dying day. It seems to me extremely unlikely that his infant lips were cleansed for the work of poetical inspiration with a burning coal. Nor nymph of Solyma nor spirit of the sacred hill of Parnassus, I imagine, waited on his toddling footsteps or stroked his chubby fist. I am willing to bet that he never plucked the quill of the white swan to pen his glowing fancies. As a matter of cold fact, it is my private opinion, fortified by much reading in the volume which Robertson has printed for Mr. Green, that he became a versifier quite late in life; that he said to himself, "Come; let us make rhymes," and being a man to suit the action to the word, forthwith girt his thighs, unsheathed his fountain pen and went to work.

Green's Versicular Experiments

Let is not be thought that I would deal harshly with the verses which Mr. Green has gathered together for the delectation of his brother-brokers of the Bohemian Club. Unlike Iago, I am nothing if not gentle in my criticism and I have always shuddered at the bloodthirstiness of the Roman mob that tore a poet for his bad verses. Mr. Green's volume, I conceive, is rather an aspiration breathed toward the meadows of asphodel by one whose feet must tarry in the paths of commercialism and the Bohemian Club than a conscious receptacle of the divine afflatus. Mr. Green is a modest versifier, I am sure; he begins with a whisper and ends with a sigh and in between these gentle breathings he melts to melancholy over loneliness and the spell of evening, life's problems and the lure of the sea. He weeps, as versifiers must ever weep, at parting from loved ones, he bids farewell to the summer with swelling breast and wreathes his sorrow with daisies and violets and mignonette. I am afraid he is like all other versifiers, a creature of varying moods, for he has rhymes for an affinity as well as for his wife and babies; but, discreet singer that he is, all are alike couched in chaste and perfectly respectable language. In truth, the entire volume contains no thought to bring the blush of embarrassment to the cheek of innocence and I see no reason why a young lady should not recommend it to her mother as perfectly safe and sane, if unpoetical.

Some Examples of His Work

In order that my readers may savor the quality of Mr. Green's outpourings I will copy here the dozen lines in which he dallies with an

Affinity

From the deep shadow of our unjoined lives,
  At last we met together, you and I;
Clasped hands; and gazing in each other's eyes,
  Paused for a time and pondered, wonderingly,
Why, in the mighty reaches of life's plain
  Our winding paths had never met before;
How long they would commingle, and again,
  What time they would divide to meet no more.
Thus pausing, and thus dreaming, we forgot
  We had been strangers ever, seeing plain,
Whate'er the future brought us, we could not,
  In all life's space be strangers e'er again.

Coleridge said that prose consisted of words in their best order while poetry demanded the best words in their best order. It is clear, I think, that in the presence of his affinity Mr. Green was too perturbed even to write prose. His words have not "met together" in their best order; they are mutinous words rebelling against the authority of syntax. As an affinitarian I do not think Mr. Green is an overpowering success. Let us look him over in the role of a husband:

To My Wife

The years are gliding by, Dear,
  And you and I must wend
Our paths together now, Dear,
  Together to the end;
And sweet it is to me to glance
  Down these long years of life
And know that you will walk by me
  Forever, My Dear Wife.

When youth's first strength I felt, Dear,
  With all the world to face,
I dreamed of fame and name, Dear,
  I thought of power and place;
But only one thought holds me now,
  But one dream thrills me through,
A sweet and quiet home, My Love,
  Where I can be with you.

I had no thought of God, Dear,
  I did not care to know
What other worlds there were, Dear,
  Where I might some day go;
But now I hope, and, hoping, feel
  That through eternity,
In happy heavens that lie beyond
  I still may walk with thee.

Remembering that Mr. Green had addressed an affinity, we realize that these lines are not as ingenuous as they seem. But aside from that, I question whether they exhibit much fervor. If Mr. Green was on the topmost pinnacle of emotion when he penned them, that fact has been deftly concealed. They will not work any great change in the habits of those who have been wont to go to Browning for the perfect expression of conjugal devotion. One more example of Mr. Green's versifying and we will "wend our paths" elsewhere:

Envoy

Ye songs are sung, and round about
  The people crowd beside me;
Some few indeed give praises out,
  Ye balance, they deride me.

I cannot say that I am blest
  By critic, rude or proper,
But will remark that I'll be blest
  If I give aught a copper

For any critic, bad or good,
  Or scanty praise or plenty,
If only I have hit the mood
  Of young miss sweet and twenty.

While the Judge Was Away

A Machiavellian disadvantage has been taken of Judge William P. Lawlor during his absence from the city. Shortly before election Judge Lawlor went to New York to mingle in the madding throng, to disport himself along the Great White Way and regale himself as becomes a man of fastidious tastes and plethoric purse. It was in New York that he received the shocking news of the crushing defeat of the Ladies' League of Justice, but he bore up manfully at Sherry's, at Del's and at other places where the atmosphere is invigorating. The past he promptly put behind him and gave himself up to current transports, but not so certain gentlemen in this city with whom he has enjoyed most friendly and confidential relations. They were busy figuring out how it happened, and they did not scruple at whispering away the little judge's fair fame, for to him more than to any other factor they attributed the popular revolt against the purifying influences that were put to rout on election day. It was the way he conducted the Calhoun case, they said, that sickened the public; he was too obvious; he did not conceal his partiality, et cetera, et cetera. All of which, say I, convicts them of base ingratitude.

The Expert In Frameups

If there is one man who did more than all others to shock this community into a sense of the enormities of the Graft Prosecution that man is William J. Burns, the detective, who lost no time in getting away from the city when the forces that guaranteed him protection were put down and out. Of Burns' methods the public has received some hints; with some of his frameups designed to inflame sentiment or to afford pretexts for strategic maneuvers the public is familiar, but the story of his career in this city in the fulness of its colorful audacities remains to be told. Some day of course light will be thrown on the things that were done by that bold and resourceful inventor of frameups; if not in the interest of justice at least for the purpose of serving as a warning to the people against empowering individuals to establish a sanhedrim above the law and dictate in secret after the manner of the Council of Ten whatsoever to them may be deemed essential for the greater good. Nothing could more clearly prove that where the law ends imposture and rascality begins than the history of the activities of William J. Burns.

The Rivalry of Gumshoe Men

Of one of the minor frameups of William J. Burns we have been reminded by the dismissal of all the cases that grew out of the alleged stealing of papers from the District Attorney's office. This was the frameup that served as a pretext for the invasion of the private offices of the United Railroads Company and the seizure and examination of the corporation's private papers. It will be remembered that the hired organs of the Graft Prosecution, to mollify public sentiment at the time, stormed at a great rate about the awful outrage that had been perpetrated by the detectives employed by the higher-ups. They were especially bitter in their denunciation of William M. Abbott, the attorney, whom they charged with having inspired the thefts. But the vilification of Abbott was a mad, continuous performance on the part of the moral crusaders, the reason being that having indicted a man they knew to be absolutely innocent, whose innocence indeed was inadvertently confessed in open court by Attorney O'Gara, they sought to justify themselves to some extent by accusing him of everything else that could be imagined. It seemed as if they hoped to persuade his friends that though he was innocent of the charge upon which he was indicted, he was at any rate so bad a man that he could have no reason to complain if wrongfully accused. So Abbott was charged with having hired detectives to steal papers from Burns. Now as a matter of fact no papers were stolen from Burns after he became a city official. Papers were stolen from him before, I believe, but not at the instigation of William M. Abbott or any other person in a position of authority. The fact is that after Burns came to San Francisco and introduced all the nastiest tricks of his trade he excited a spirit of rivalry among gumshoe men, and in a short time all sorts of mean deceptions and petty tricks were being played. Under the inspiration of Burns rogues employed as detectives were set to catch rogues, and there were several rogues not on Burns' staff who had so much contempt for that high-salaried spy that "to show him up" as they said, they were constantly handing him gold bricks, sending him on wild-goose chases, leading him into traps, bewildering him with trivial frameups and occasionally picking his pockets. But of course Burns had an advantage over his rivals, for he was a public official with the power of official authority behind him, and finally he succeeded in putting an end to the mischievousness from which he had been suffering by causing several arrests on trumped up charges.

A Bruguiere in the Cruel War

It is my duty as a conscientious historian to record that the Battle of Fizz Water continues with unexampled ferocity. So hotly is the field being contested that the newspapers which formerly mentioned the names of the various champagnes as unreservedly as the different kinds of automobiles, have decided to give the embattled vintages no free advertising and accordingly you see no mention of Clicquot or Pommery, White Seal or Mumms in the news columns these days. The latest warrior to enter the combat is none other than Emile Bruguiere who has sworn allegiance to the cause of Monopol and who henceforward will wear Red Top on his coat of arms. Strange as it may seem, Bruguiere has never been a drinker of champagne, but he does not expect to be handicapped in his work by this deficiency which can always be remedied. Owing to his new position Bruguiere refrained from attending the Greenway ball; he felt that the presence of a rival wine agent might embarrass the czar. Willie O'Connor, the Clicquot exponent, lacks these delicate scruples or else he does not regard the Greenway ball as exclusively a champagne function; so he went and enjoyed it immensely.

Why Monopol Lost Ground

It may surprise many to learn that Bruguiere has espoused the cause of Monopol. This is not a popular wine in San Francisco, but the difficulty to be overcome in pushing it to the front may have been the very thing to captivate the romantic soul of the Bruguiere. There is an interesting story behind the comparative unpopularity of Red Top in this city. Several years ago a chap named Campbell came here and put up at the Palace, announcing himself as the agent of Monopol. He was accompanied by his wife, a beautiful woman who was dazzlingly arrayed in jeweled ornaments. Campbell cut a wide swath. He had a magnetic personality which enabled him to make friends quickly and it was delightful to find, a few hours after meeting him, that he had sent a case of Monopol to one's apartments, merely as a testimonial of esteem. Naturally the wine became popular. The newcomer's weak side was his devotion to gambling and within a few days he was losing considerable money. The effect upon his wife was conspicuous. Day by day she appeared with fewer gems and in less gorgeous raiment, until one morning she was seen in tears and dressed in severe and totally unjeweled black. The next day another Monopol man arrived here and had Campbell arrested. Then it was found that he had lost all his cash in gambling and that his wife's jewels had been pledged to keep up the pace. Campbell's new friends rallied to his support, but as soon as they bailed him out of jail on one charge the Monopol man had him arrested on another and by the time all the charges, which grew out of some dispute as to administration and involved no criminality on Campbell's part, had been straightened out, the resources of Campbell's friends were pretty well exhausted and they hated the name of Monopol. Campbell and his wife left town and Monopol has been unpopular ever since. It remains to be seen what Bruguiere's efforts will accomplish for it.

A Victim of the Battle

Just to enlighten my readers as to the intensity of the warfare in this great Battle of Fizz Water, I will relate a little incident which took place a few nights ago. A certain agent of a high grade vintage succumbed to the fierceness of the fray and was taken to the French hospital in an exhausted condition. The physicians informed him that wine-drinking had ruined his constitution and that he had not long to live. He became delirious and one night while in this condition escaped from the hospital and made his way, heaven knows how, to the hammam of a big downtown hostelry. There he was put to bed in a room adjoining that occupied for the night by Mackenzie, the chief Pommery man. The delirious man had visions of death and got down on his knees, groaning "God have mercy on my soul" over and over again. At last Mackenzie was awakened by the lugubrious chant. "What's that?" he cried so loudly that an attendant rushed in and explained the situation. "Is that the result of wine drinking?" said Mackenzie in an awed voice; "then the water wagon for me" and he turned over with a sigh and went to sleep again.

"I long for a motor." "Try auto-suggestion."

A Word With Cholly Francisco

I must confess that I am deeply grieved; sorrow broods over my soul like the melancholy bird upon the bust of Pallas—I cannot shake it off—and the reason for my dejection is a lapse of language committed by Cholly Francisco. This is too much. Last week when I was compelled to find fault with the fine writers of the Call and Chronicle, I little thought that impartial censoriousness would make it necessary for me to reprove one whose matutinal babble lightens the pages of the Examiner. Yet so it is; I have found Cholly nodding, and although I remember the saying of the poet, "Aliquando bonus dormitat Homerus," I cannot refrain from placing a rebuking finger upon the transgression of one of my favorites. For Cholly is one of my prime favorites. His half-column causerie is usually bright, frequently stimulating and continuously amusing. I never overlook it. I like the airiness of its view, the piquancy of its anecdotage, the sanity of its social tolerance. Cholly is a charming flaneur and there is no blague about his impertinences. He is a stylist, too; cunning in the collocation of verbs and gifted with a delicate flair for fragrant adjectives. Just the reason, in my opinion, why Cholly should not be indulged in slipshod composition. And now for the reason why I am so sad—here are the words of Cholly that plunged me in gloom: "When Consuelo Yznaga was a poor girl in New York, hopeful for a title or expectant of a fortune, under the espionage of Mrs. Paran Stevens"—Horrors! Cholly, how could you? "Under the espionage of Mrs. Paran Stevens." Get thee to a dictionary, Cholly, and study the sinister significance of that word "espionage." Was Consuelo Yznaga a frisky youngster and Mrs. Stevens her alarmed duenna? I know you intended no such implication, but that misplaced word suggests the odious thought. Cholly, I shall not be happy again until you outshine your usual faultless brilliancy.

Belasco's No-Star Theatres

David Belasco has lost no time in bidding against the backers of New York's repertory theatre for the approbation and patronage of metropolitan playgoers. He has announced plans for his two theatres, the Belasco and the new Belasco-Stuyvesant, which include the no-star system and the presentation of just four plays every year, two at each of the playhouses. Belasco proposes to give new and vital dramas with casts as nearly approaching perfection as possible and he will begin with the production of "The Lily," a sex-play which he has adapted from the French of Wolff and Leroux. In his list of players are Nance O'Neil, Charles Cartwright, Julia Dean, Bruce McRae, Leo Ditrichstein, Aubrey Boucicault, Dodson Mitchell, Alfred Hickman, Florence Nash and others. Belasco's plans differ from those of the New Theatre in this that he will not essay the repertory system but will keep one play running continuously; but like the New Theatre management, he will endeavor to subordinate the players to the play and will refrain from featuring any actor or actress as a star. He has announced that his players are of the sort who can fittingly enact Macbeth today, Mercutio tomorrow and Master Slender the day after tomorrow. "The Lily" is said to be a play which will fully tax their capabilities, for it is described as a drama dealing with an unhackneyed phase of the sex problem calculated to arouse heated discussion. To show the sacrifices which the members of his company have been willing to make in furtherance of his latest venture Belasco says that Leo Ditrichstein, a well known character comedian, "has modestly assumed a role in 'The Lily' which many a manager would not dare offer the callow graduate of a dramatic college without fear of irreparably injuring his vanity."

"The Wizard" and Dogmatism

All this is intensely interesting. Really, it would seem that the drama has taken a new lease of life in New York. First came the New Theatre with Sothern and Marlowe in an elaborate production of "Antony and Cleopatra," then William Faversham in Stephen Philipps' gorgeous poetic drama, "Herod" and now David Belasco has joined the theatrical procession. Almost as interesting as these ambitious plans of his are Belasco's articles of dramatic belief or unbelief which have been set forth at length in connection with the exploitation of his new venture. "I shall not subscribe to any dogmatic article of artistic faith," he declares, "for the very good reason that I do not believe in dogmas of any sort. The moment art, particularly dramatic art, becomes dogmatized it must suffer quite as much as does religion when subjected to the same blighting and benumbing influence." Herein, I think, Belasco is at fault. Probably he has adopted these phrases without much pondering of their meaning, for it is very much the fashion among second-rate theologians and others nowadays to rail at all dogmas with real dogmatic bitterness. Religion without dogma is a contradiction of terms and so, I take it, is art without dogma. If the rules which have been evolved and consecrated for the guidance of artists are not dogmatic I would like to know what they are. Of course there arise from time to time antinomians who refuse to be bound by certain dogmatic rules but if they prove to be genuine artists it does not

The Family's Stork Room

The first large banquet given in the Family Club's handsome new quarters took place Tuesday evening. It was in honor of Clarence Ward who designed the artistic club-house in Bush street. About 150 members were gathered at the board in the Stork room, which, after the manner of Whistler's famous Peacock Room, has a frieze of these amiable birds in every angle of flight. It is certainly effective and I am told that the building committee of the new Bohemian Club now going up at Post and Taylor streets, is considering designs for an Owl Room. Whether or not the new Pacific Union Club is to have a bird room, I cannot say. "A Canvasback Room" is a humble suggestion.

The Family To Have a Cat.

Tombstone III, the cimmerian pet of the Press Club, is threatened with a rival in local clubdom, for The Family is thinking seriously of adopting a cat. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that The Family is having a cat thrust upon it—by the cat, for the cat has practically adopted The Family. Ever since the earthquake and fire a gray tramp of the feline species has made his headquarter on the Powell Street lot which is now occupied by the Family clubhouse. The animal is wild, ferocious almost, and utters the most unearthly yowls ever heard from one of his breed. Every cabman and chauffeur in Powell street has a brickbat handy for this prowler when he deserts his habitat in search of nutriment. Since the home of The Family was built the animal's life has been particularly hard, for no birds alight in the neighborhood now and his quest for food takes him far afield. But always he returns in time to yowl the members of The Family from their first sweet slumber. So a council was held a few days ago and it was decided that self-protection demanded the adoption of this untamed nomad. The plan will be proceeded with just as soon as some doughty Family man plucks up sufficient courage and strategy to bell the cat. Just when that will be I do not know.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy.

Stocks—Values during the recent week have been marked with much stability, and considerable advances have been seen. Copper securities were the leading factors in the betterment, based on the progress made in connection with the copper merger. Announcement of the Missouri Pacific financing plan was inconsequential as a market factor in the Gould securities but some light was thrown on the future of these properties in their upbiulding. The matter can be looked on as very favorable. The closing of the week was marked by the handing down of the decision of the Standard Oil case by the United States Circuit Court, against the company. This suit was based on the dissolving of the so-called trust. The case will now go to the United States Supreme Court and a year will probably pass before a final adjustment can be had. The stock market in the final dealings of the week reflected this decision and broke sharply. We can see no special menace in this decision at the moment, and we expect to see values higher and good support Monday.

Grain—Small receipts, large exports and higher Liverpool prices have held the bulls in command of wheat. The blizzard over the spring wheat region held down shipments to half of a year ago, and the week closes with another reduction in visible that will require some days of heavy receipts to replenish. There is nothing in sight to change the bull position, but many things to strengthen it. The Minneapolis mills are grinding 700,000 bushels a week more than last year, with the sales of flour holding strong. The buyers of December are the big holders of the cash grain and there is little outlook now for Chicago to increase its supply sufficiently to break the bull crowd. Along with the advance of the future has been a corresponding advance in the cash and with the month so close at hand it looks as if the two cents difference will be made up by advance of the option instead of decline in the cash. We are still on a strong domestic wheat basis, the exports of flour from the East and flour and grain from the Pacific making a good total export movement. Europe has held to its advance on expectation of decline in Russian shipments and reduced supply by the time Argentine wheat is available.

Corn—Outlook grows stronger, as shipping period has been reached with smaller quantities available than last year. The cold weather has moderated and corn has not been helped; instead there is a universal complaint in the big states of excessive moisture producing mould and rot. The corn arriving is less than local consumptive demand at Chicago. At Kansas City and St. Louis, the exporters and Southwest are competitors for all corn of shipping quality and this condition will prevail for some weeks. The short interest has remained stubborn and with 30,000,000 sold for delivery in Chicago, it is impossible for any change of weather to permit sufficient arrivals to satisfy half of this interest. It looks now as if the corn movement will not be under way before January.

Cotton—Spinners' talkings for the week tell the same old story: Plenty of talk of "short time" and of mills "shutting down," but little actual "do." Of course it would be absurd to think of such a thing, but if the rate of 358,000 bales per week could be kept up there would be needed, to fill out a year, something like 19,000,000 bales. Now, as there may not be room enough for them to take 12,000,000 bales without bringing the visible at the end of the year to nil, such a calculation is significant of what spinners are doing for the supply of their future wants. Much has been said about present prices, that is 14½ to 15 cents for spots, checking business. Even last year with all of its "bigness," there were but few weeks that exceeded 358,000 bales and not many that reached this figure. Surely there could be no better sign that prices have not yet reached a level where consumption will be checked sufficiently to bring the total takings within the limits of this year's unusually small production. The true inwardness of the situation is best illustrated by the total takings of American cotton since September 1, 2,980,000 against 2,942,000 for the same period last year and 2,280,000 in 1907 when the total takings amounted to 12,100,000 bales. Figures show that foreign spinners are advising their American cousins to do as they say and not as they do; they are nearly 200,00 bales to the good out of the cream of the short crop—that much ahead of their handsome takings for the corresponding 80 days of last year, and if they can only succeed in keeping the wool over the eyes of American spinners they will do even better. To fill out a 12,000,000 bale consumption would require 230,000 a week; anything over that necessarily indicates that the mills are providing ahead for eventualities.

Copper—The action of the copper share market during the past week has fully verified our prediction made then that the price of the metal was gradually rising, and that a merger was and is being formed to economize production and to make more universal the use of copper metal as has been done in the market. While at present there is a surplus, that surplus is no greater than would last the world a short sixty days if the production of the mine were entirely curtained. The closest students of copper metal, such men as Horace Stevens, are predicting that history will repeat itself and that the world can look for a shortage of copper metal again. Based on a minimum consumption of eight hundred million pounds of copper metal, the copper merger will be able to pay a six percent dividend on the preferred stock, while at the present rate of consumption which we have no doubt will grow in the future, the merger will be able to earn 18 per cent on present prices of the metal, giving a fair prospective value to its common shares. No doubt the right to subscribe to this stock will be valuable and shares in the subsidiary companies before long will sell at a premium. At the present there is big and quick money to be made by buying shares in these subsidiary companies and especially in the porphyry coppers which have demonstrated their ability to earn good dividends at present prices of the metal. These are preferably in order of mention, Miami, Nevada Consolidated, Giroux, Ray Con. and Gila. While Am-

Local Securities—Our local market for stocks and bonds continues to present a firm front, even though the trading for the past week or so has been somewhat reduced. Associated Oil stock seems to be the public favorite and keeps on breaking high records on this move. While there are all sorts of unconfirmed rumors floating around on Associated Oil, it seems sensible to suppose that some sort of a favorable announcement is coming out on it shortly because a deal of the buying is said to be for inside account. Spring Valley Water has been another active issue and, after last week's reaction, has recovered strength and shows an increasing demand. It is said that much depends on the final decision of the Board of Supervisors as to the purchase of Spring Valley's local distributing system and the stock continues to be influenced by rumors concerning this sale. Pacific Telephone stocks, now really a part of the New York Stock Market, have shown activity in spots lately, but the trend of their prices seems to conform to the general tone of Eastern stock market conditions. The power stock group is gradually gaining in popularity and Northern California Power, City Electric, Pacific Lighting stocks and Pacific Gas and Electric stocks all have a steady demand at increasing prices. Alaska Packers has had a temporary setback, probably caused by profit-taking, but at the present writing this press of realizing stock seems to be lessening and the shares are pointing upward again. Hawaiian Sugar stocks have been quieter but still hang on to their recent advances. The demand for raw sugar together with the improving conditions at the plantations, is causing this firm feeling. The local bond market does not show much change and the issues that are most active at this time are Associated Oil 5s, California Gas and Electric 5s, City Electric 5s, Contra Costa Water 5s, Los Angeles Railway 5s, Los Angeles Pacific first 5s, Northern California Power Co. 5s, Pacific Telephone 5s, Southern Pacific refunding 4s, Spring Valley Water 4s and United Railroads 4s. While it is felt that almost any of the leading California securities will show a nice profit by the first of the year, the general talk is that purchases of Pacfic Gas and Electric, common and preferred, Alaska Packers and Associated Oil are the most advisable for the moment.

Your foot is the tiniest that trips, love,
Thro' the maddening maze of the waltz;
Two blossoming buds are your lips, love,
Your eyes say your heart is not false.

Your hands are so dainty and white, love,
Your figure so wondrously fine,
That I'm tempted almost, but not quite, love,
To say, I adore you!—be mine!

But no! there's a frightening fear, love,
That will not allow me to speak.
You're spending three thousand a year, love;

Amy Crocker's Latest Escapade

I am not surprised to learn that Amy Crocker-Ashe-Gillig-Gouraud has spent three weeks in the harem of a Bombay maharajah. Mrs. Gouraud has a genius for doing the unexpected and if there is anything outre which she has not attempted in her variegated career, the deficiency will undoubtedly be made up in due course. From earliest girlhood Mrs. Gouraud has been a magazine of sensations; not to be able to exhaust the fingers of both hands in counting over her amazing escapades argues one unfamiliar with the unwritten history of Sacramento, San Francisco and New York. She is compounded of the stuff from which best-sellers are manufactured, but her deeds make fiction pale and her personality is compact of such contradictory traits that no romancer with an eye to verisimilitude would dare to depict her. It was inevitable that the fascinated maharajah should single her from among his guests as the particular object of his hospitality and it was just as inevitable that Mrs. Gouraud should accept his invitation. To be bidden to a harem unchaperoned is not the lot of many American women; to go is to outdo the wildest dream of feminine daring; and to stay three weeks was, for Mrs. Gouraud, to act entirely in character, for there is a thoroughness about all her deeds which constitutes their especial charm.

"Three Weeks in a Harem"

I have often wondered whether Mrs. Gouraud will ever write her memoirs. There are few women whose memories are so bountifully stocked with material for purple paragraphs. Lady Mary Wortley Montagu devoted several piquant pages to her inspection of the Sultan's harem at Constantinople, but the vivacious Lady Mary did not stay for three weeks and the most intimate secrets of the seraglio were not revealed to her. For instance, the interesting ceremony of the throwing of the handkerchief did not come within her experience; but I should willingly wager that whatever takes the place of that thrilling function in the harem of a Bombay maharajah could be accurately described by Mrs. Gouraud. "Three Weeks in a Harem" would be a fetching title for a chapter in her memoirs and that she is capable of handling the theme in a fashion that would arouse the envy of Elinor Glyn I haven't the slightest doubt. In the interview on this subject, which she gave to the Hearst papers on her return to New York, Mrs. Gouraud touched on one or two details of harem life. She told of the lengthy toilet and indicated quite plainly that during her stay she was treated like all the rest of the maharajah's favorites. It was like her to want to take part in the celebrated cobra dance and it must have been a keen disappointment to her when permission was refused. If Mrs. Gouraud had lived in the days of Salammbo she would never have been content unless she had been allowed to caress the sacred serpent of the Cathaginians. It is part of her nature to desire to leave undone nothing that is within the bounds of possibility.

Something About Amy Crocker

The Hearst interviewer made one bad mistake in writing of Mrs. Gouraud. He stated that she was the daughter of Porter Ashe "whose first wife was Amy Crocker of the California millionaire family." This is to confuse mother and daughter, but is excusable, perhaps, owing to the mixed relationship existing between them. The lady who stayed for three weeks in the harem was Mrs. Amy Crocker-Ashe-Gillig-Gouraud. She is the daughter of Edward Bryant Crocker of Sacramento, a brother of Charles Crocker, and her father left his widow an estate of several millions. Amy Crocker was a capricious belle and had many admirers, among them Harry Gillig, Frank Unger and Harry Dam. One of the many stories told about her is that on a certain memorable occasion Harry Gillig and Frank Unger who were chums, flipped a coin to determine which should offer her his hand in marriage. It was agreed that the loser should always be a member of the winner's menage. It appears that neither had any doubt about his ability to capture the heiress, but Porter Ashe stepped in and carried off the prize. It will be remembered that on their honeymoon they were in the Tehachapi railway accident and that Porter rescued his bride from a burning coach.

Her Other Matrimonial Ventures

One child was born to the couple and was named Alma. When they were divorced Amy kept her daughter, but afterwards the little girl was adopted by her grandmother who changed her name from Alma Ashe to Gladys Crocker and left her a large fortune. That this child inherited many of her mother's vivacious and attractive characteristics there can be no doubt. An amusing story is told of her. While in the tender care of her grandmother she asked permission to give a party. Mrs.

Crocker consented and suggested that she prepare a list of the friends whom she wished to invite. After several hours of reflection the list was submitted. It contained twelve names and there was not the name of a girl among them. Amy Crocker's second matrimonial experiment was with Harry Gillig who died a short time ago. Apparently the old compact which he made with Frank Unger was still in force, for Unger became the secretary of Harry Gillig and Mrs. Amy-Crocker-Ashe-Gillig. Another divorce followed and Amy again embarked on the troublous sea of marriage, this time with Jackson Gouraud, her present husband. At about the same time her daughter, Gladys Crocker, wedded Powers Gouraud, a brother of Jackson, thus establishing a queer relationship with her own mother. The Gouraud brothers were the sons of a Colonel Gouraud who used to be described as "one of the foremost American promoters in England," whatever that means. Powers Gouraud was a struggling Thespian on Broadway before his marriage transported him to Easy street. Mrs. Powers Gouraud must now be about twenty-five years of age.

Engagements and Engagement Rumors

If I am not badly mistaken we are on the eve of a number of engagement announcements. I have not been studying the signs of hidden romances for nothing during the past few years and I think it is no hazard to say that the mythological young person who wields the bow on the menu cards and valentines has been more than ordinarily busy since the commencement of the winter season. For instance, there is Kathleen De Young.

This interesting belle has been accepting the attentions of the young son of a very wealthy widow and the fact that this chap, not so long ago, was desperately smitten with the charms of a granddaughter of Mrs. Eleanor Martin does not argue against the intensity of his devotion to Miss De Young. Then there is Genevieve Walker who returned to this city recently. She is constantly seen these days in the company of one whom Jane Austen would have called "a gallant son of Mars" and her friends are awaiting the happy tidings that follow an acceptance. Time was, not so long since, when

John Gallois was attracted otherwhere, but at the present time he is so evidently captivated by fascinating little Eliza McMullin that when some of his friends spied him taking tea with her at the Fairmont the other day, they straightway pronounced it a case of engagement in petto. Another bit of rumor has it that dainty Flossie Cluff has been enmeshed in the silken net of the love god and that the tall athletic chap who has been a guest recently at all of the box parties which she has given is the lucky man. Miss Gussie Foute's friends are greatly mystified by her demeanor. She is ever smiling and happy, like one who guards a sweet secret, and it may be that the orchids she wears partly betray that secret's import. But what fortunate chap shares it with her? Is it the young son of a prominent newspaper proprietor of other days or the heir of a very prominent optician who has been much to the fore in reform politics? I confess that I am at a loss in this case.

Two More Orchid Girls

Now that interesting little Marie Churchill who has been ill, is about again, her friends observe that she wears fresh orchids every day and as her constant escort is John Martin Heinki, there is not much secrecy about the affair. The knowing ones say that there will be a formal announcement of their engagement within a short time. Another romantic attachment which has been closely watched by the seekers for signs matrimonial is that of attractive Elizabeth Woods and Lovell Langstroth. I have been told that this couple plighted their troth before Miss Woods made her debut last year and that on account of their youth, Mrs. Woods insisted that her daughter should make her bow in society and enjoy one season's gaiety before she thought seriously of wedding. Young Langstroth has been a constant cavalier at Monterey and in this city and I am told that the frivolities of the past twelvemonth have not caused the young lady to change her mind.

Distinguished Visitors From London

Easy-going, gullible San Francisco has often been imposed upon by the claims of spurious and half-baked members of European aristocracy, wining and dining them as if they were the elect of heaven. But when a distinguished couple like the charming Mr. and Mrs. John Alexander Hope of London who are guests of the Eugene de Sablas come here as visitors, by their very modesty they luckily escape the banqueting, the feting and boring entertaining which would have been forced upon them had their prestige been advertised. Few families in England are more highly connected than that of Mr. and Mrs. Hope. Mr. Hope is the son of Lord Edward Hope and Lady Hope, and a brother of Lord Cary and a sister will one day be Lady Landsdowne, provided she survives the present Lady Landsdowne. The Landsdowne family has had its finessing, guiding hand on affairs of state in England for several generations. Mrs. Hope was Miss Dunsmuir of Vancouver. She is very wealthy in her own right, but that fact has not spoiled her in the least. She looks and dresses much more like a Parisienne than a London woman, being chic and of graceful petite figure. Her face radiates vivacity. She and Mrs. Clement Tobin, the two of them being much together, were easily among the most beautiful women at the Greenway ball and the most becomingly gowned.

Miss Case's Solitaire

Perhaps the fact that Miss Mary Adele Case's concert took place on the same night as the first of the Greenway parties accounted for the very slender attendance. The few who went to hear this young lady sing were unanimous in their hearty praise of her vocal talent. One thing about her did not escape notice. Miss Case was very fetchingly gowned but she wore no jewels—except one. This was nothing less than a splendid solitaire diamond which sparkled on her "engagement finger." Naturally this clue to a heart secret has revived the gossip of her engagement to young Claus Spreckels and I know more than one bavarde who would give anything to learn the inwardness of this affair. It is known that John D. Spreckels does not approve the infatuation of his son and the fact that the young chap is in his father's employ at Coronado while Miss Case is staying in this city augurs ill for his romance. The general query is: Has the affair reached a stage, as indicated by the diamond ring, which will defeat the father's wishes? We can only watch and wait.

Mrs. Tobin's Fan

A conspicuous little bit of dainty vanity that Mrs. Tobin had with her at the ball was her fan. Ever so many remarked it, for its oddity excited much attention. It consisted of three full willowy Prince of Wales tips of white ostrich feathers, arranged in the fleur-de-lis design. The base of the feathers was clasped or mounted in a long gold handle, this being set with large opals and emeralds. Mrs. Tobin's gown was scarcely less original. A Paris gown, it is fashioned of soft handmade Cluny lace woven of silver threads, while the skirt is formed of broad bands of opal-tinted beads in which an iridescent green color predominates. Large emeralds emphasize the paler green tints.

The Misses Withrow were hostesses at a delightful informal tea during the week at their studio in Pine street.
